THE LION'S MOUTH.

"THE gravest beast is an ass, the gravest bird is an owl, the gravest fish is an oyster, and the gravest man is a fool." SYDNEY SMITH.

"I WILL roar, that I will do any man's heart good to hear me." A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.

"I WILL aggravate my voice so, that I will roar you as gently as any sucking dove; I will roar you an 't were any nightingale." IBID.

"Nil falsi audeat, nil veri non audeat dicere." CICERO.

Fitz-Smythe Redivivus.

The public were some time ago made aware of the fact that Fitz-Smythe, tho giftod, the versatile, the humerous, had, after encountering many perils in Arizonu, and losiug his hungry, hut spirited steed, returned to San Francisco. They anxiously looked forward to seeing the local colums of the Alta enriched with the productions of the facile pen of Fitz-Smythe, the gifted. For some time they looked in vain. Whoever it was who filled Fitz-Smythe's place often nttempted to imitate that great writer's style, but the fraud was soon detected by the public. He made bad jokes, atrocious jokes, but not so bad as Fitz-Smythe's. Now it is certuin that Fitz-Smythe is once more on the Alta, engaged in chronicling runawuys, drunks and the other incidents which go to make up the sum of city life. We think Fitz-Smythe commenced his labors on Sunday, for in last Monday's issue of the Alta, a brilliant essay entitled "Yesterday," appeared in the locul column. It commenced thus:

"It has not been our province frequently to enjoy a more delightful day, in all respects, than yesterday. It was in the morning as brightly beautiful nnd cnlm as that day in Paradise when Adam was a buchelor and uwoke to find blushing Eve at his side. And so it continued with little variation all day long. Thousands of the people, including many households, and young maids nnd men who in a few years will become heads of families, were enticed across the Bay."

A stern mnterialist would, perhaps, object to the above. He would say that although Fitz-Smythe might consider it his "province" to enjoy delightful days, it was uot his province to write a lot of stuff about Adam being a bachelor in Paradise and awaking to find blushing Eve at his side. He would say that such a statement, even supposing that it could he ruthenticuted, which is impossible, is not city uews. For ourselves we welcome Fitz-Smythe back to his old position with joy. How beautifully suggestive is the phrase, "young maids and men who in a few years will become heads of families!" How delicate the euphemism "were enticed across huy," so different from the coarse expressiou "went over to Oakland!" While the brilliant wit, glorious humor, and poetic fancy of Fitz-Smythe continue to give lustre to the columns of the Alta it would he unkind to point ont any of those little errors which men of genius often make. Were it not for this feeling we should remonstrate with Fitz-Smythe for having said in the course of a thrilling description of a gorgeous rnnaway which resulted in a young lady being knocked down: "she was run over, and so badly injured that feurs are entertuined of her recovery." Of course this is a mere slip, Fitz knows as well as we do that the more severely persons are injured, the less fear there is of their recovery. Go on und prosper, oh shiniug light of the literature of the Pacific Coast.

Christianizing the Poor.

The State of New York does all it can to save the souls of the poor. A law passed by the last Legislature makes it a misdemeanor to fish or hunt on the Sabbath day. Any person seen with a gnn or fishing rod, excepting on his own premises, is li ible to arrest and punishment. Real estate owners or lessees are not prevented from breaking the Sabbath. The Legislature of New York will not look after their spiritual welfare, hut any man who is seen with a fishing rod, off his own premises, whether he has caught fish or not, must he arrested and puuished. We fear that the landless ones of the State must often observe with envy the property holder as he sits bobbing for eels on his premises, and wish that he too wns rich enough to break the Sabbath without incurring arrest and punishment for misdemeanor.

Death From Old Age.

One death from old age is recorded in this week's mortuary report. Very nucommon in california. Few of our fast youug meu die of this complaint.

Hard Upon Lord Dundreary.

The following circular dated "Admiralty, May 15th, 1867," has heeu issued to the English Navy:

"I am commanded by my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to acquaint yon that they desire to draw the attention of Commanders-in-Chief and senior officers to a custom which appears to be somewhat prevaleut in the fleet, of officers wearing whiskers of such iuordinate size and length as to resemble heards, which latter are prohibited by the printed instructions. The regulations of the naval service require that any such irregular habit should be prevented, and that officers should be permitted only to wear the same length of whiskers as the seumen nnd marines under their divisional superintendence. I am, sir, etc., HENRY G. LENNOX."

Good gracious! If there is not an aristocratic mutiny in the fleet there ought to be. This circular is evidently aimed at the Dundreary whiskers. Who are the Lords of the Admiralty that they should term the whiskers of officers and gentlemen of "inordiuate size and length?" This is indeed tyranny! The insult conveyed in the last sentence, is the most galling ever offered to British officers. They are to be "permitted only to wear the same length of whiskers as the seamen and marines under their divisional superintendence." This is a pretty democratic move. Lord Dundreary will, we imagine, howl cousiderably when his long, drooping, aristocratic whiskers are cropped to match the blacking-brnsh-like clumps of bristles which adorn the cheeks of private William Jones, R. M. L. I. or Jack Taffruil, A. B. Beards are forbidden by the printed instructions from time immemorial, hut this does not, cannot justify the prond and tyrannical Lords of the Admirality in ordering the croppiug of whiskers because they resemble beards. We cannot believe that these bold British swells will submit to be shorn without offering at least a protest.

The Eight Hour System.

All must sympathizo with tho hard-worked operatives who have hitherto been compelled to labor—with a breathing spell now and theu—for teu hours a day, and will rejoice that the eight-hour system has been inaugurated to relieve these sons of toil. There are other sons of toil, however, besides plumbers and glaziers, bricklayers, carpenters and sand shovelers who still claim the sympathy of the public. A "Cheap John" auctioneer advertises in a daily paper for "clerks" —"two energetic young men of good address who are familiar with clothing, gents' furnishing goods, und boots and shoes." These energetic young meu of good address intimately acquainted with clothing, gents' furnishing goods, etc., can obtain $75 a mouth each. A postcript informs them that "the very best of references will be required as to integrity aud ability," and that "the store opens at 6 A. M. and closes at 11 P. M." Thus we see that these energetic young men are required to work fifteen hours a day, are compelled to shout peans in praise of socks only twenty cents a pair, aud glorify until they are hoarse, tobacco sold at the low price of only twenty-five cents for three papers, and otherwise exhnust and degrade themselves both mentally and physically. When will those unhuppy young men of good address experience the beuefits of the eight-hour system? Alas! we fear that it will be long, indeed, before they will obtaiu equal rights with their more muscular brethren, who object to working even eight hours a day for $3, while these poor slaves of good address have to wear out tongues, brains and bodies, during fifteen hours of each twenty-four for about the sume sum.

The "Boys'" Primaries.

The "Boys" are said to have had it all their own way in the election of delegates to the Mnnicipal and County Convention. They arranged things. Auyone not pledged to vote the State aud County ticket uuscrutched was turned out of the political church. Some men were knocked down. Tho Bulletin remarks that the general body of citizens took no part in the affair. Quiet, respectable people prefer to vote now-a days without being knocked down. Some pugilistic acquirement is now necessary to make a competent voter. Gorham nouminates Couuty officers, Conuess, the Legislative. Our authority is the Bulletin. Whut a blessing it is to live iu a free country! The Primaries were legalized to preserve the purity of the ballot, and now the respectable cits. don't like to go near the polls, fearing unpleasant results, The "Boys" at the helm. Gorhum and Couness pull well together. Perhaps Gorham's whiffle-tree is a little ahead.

A Noble Fireman.

A French paper says thut the Prince of Wales is a captain of the Fire Engineers of London. This is not exactly correct. Soon after his return from New York, the Prince got up a voluuteer fire company of his own, whose roll comprised the name of many a noble swell; but the paid Fire Department of London, supported by the Firo Insurance Compuuies, is composed of working-men, and even a priace would not he allowed to pluy at being a firemun for any length of timo.

Muzzling the Press.

The Press of the United States is free, no President, Governor or Legislature can "muzzlo the Press." When the enemies of the Flag which is a very free, and free-spoken piper, wish to "muzzle" it, all they can do is to appeal, not to the Pomdmaster, but to the Sheriff. They tried to do so once moro on Tuesday last, but the Flag slipped its muzzle and barked furiously.

The Market War.

When Mr. Lloyd Tevis and others, commenced to huild their market on California street, the occupants of stalls in Washington Market said to themselves, "He thiuks he'll get us to move, does he? Let him build on. Stalls will he pretty cheap in that market. We may move there if we can make our own terms, aud get stalls at our own figures, otherwise you don't catch us turning out of Washington Market." In the meantime, Mr. Lloyd Tevis and associates went on building and the new market was nearly completed. The hutchers chuckled to themselves when they thought how Tevis would look when he opened his market without any occupants, and gazed upon his beggarly account of empty stalls. One fine afternoon Mr. Lloyd Tevis walked down to the proprietors of the larger portion of the Washington Market property, bought it, and before five o'clock all the chief hutchers in the market received notice to quit one month from date. Then was the air blue with oaths, blood flew from juicy porter-house steaks, as the infuriated hutchers rudely hucked them, wishing, meanwhile, that the carcass of the politic and crafty Tevis was lying under their cleavers. Swearing, however, would do no good, the hutchers were forced to accept the position. A notable hutcher, the oracle of the market, said, "he s'posed he'd have to move, but he'd he early in the field, aud would get his pick of the stalls in the new market." He went for this purpose, und finding a stall which suited him, went to the office, prepared to "plank down the cash." "I've picked out No.—" he said. The clerk answered politely, "oh uo, sir, No.— is your stall," and all the other hutchers were treated in the same way; they were told they must take, not what they wanted, but what they could get, and will-he nil-he, each hutcher had to march into the stall chosen for him hy the proprietors. Since that day terrible threats have been uttered. All the capitalists in the city have been begged to huild markets. The Ninntic Hotel was to he pulled down, and turned into a market. Some irreverent wretch suggested that the Grace Church property might be purchased and a market built thereon; the Synagogue was not safe. We were threntened with markets as thick as mushrooms in all parts of the city. Now peace once more reigns, and it will not he long before both the butchers and the public congratulate themselves upon having so fine a market in such a desirable location, in place of the dilapidated shed on Merchant street, which has for so many years served us an asylum and nursery for rats.

Complimentary to Literary People.

The following sweet little paragraph is "going the rounds of the Press:"

"Literary ability, like insanity, is sometimes hereditary. Thomas Hood's son writes, and so does Douglas Jerrold's, while Thackeray's and Maryntt's daughters have been following the paternal example for some time. Mr. Dickens' daughter has now, too, begun a second story in her father's publication."

"Literary ability, like insanity, is sometimes hereditary! Why didn't the fellow say like the King's Evil? We wonder whether it is catching, like the measles. This is truly an astounding discovery. It is not strange that the qualities of speed and pluck which distinguish the Morgan breed of horses should be transmitted, but miraculous, indeed, that the man of brains should beget son or daughter with brain. Of course Judge Axtell holds that the son of a hod carrier, himself a descendent of a long line of hod carriers, is the peer in intellect of a man. It is possible to improve the breed of horses, but not the breed of men. All men are equal, and the son of a hod carrier is just as likely to turn out a brilliant novelist as the son of Douglas Jerrold, Alexandre Dumas, or Thomas Hood, though literary ubility like insanity, is sometimes hereditury.

High Literary Authority.

A poorly-educated young man, who was ambitious of writing for the Press, and eventually becoming "an editor," asked a friend what means he could most speedily acquire a correct style of English composition. He was told to read the best authors, and study their style. Unfortunately this well-meant advice did not have a good effect for the youth, holding that the most popular authors were the best, framed his grammar on the language Mark Twain puts into the mouths of his rustic characters, and took Artemus Wardas an authority in the matter of spelling. When told of his error, he said he "was no ways ambitions of writing for people of nice grammatical taste, the easiest way to spell a word was the best way, and as to rules of grammar he didn't see but whut people done just as well without them, and talked a damn sight plainer."

A Very Likely Story.

The following appeared among the dispatches received by the Bulletin yesterday:

"NEW YORK, July 18.—A Herald's special says the movement throughout the South, ostensibly for the purpose of avenging the death of Maximilian, is really the inauguration of a new rebellion."

It is rather more probable that this rumor of an expedition "to avenge the death of Maximilian" arose from the inauguration of an egrutious scheme on a large scale hy Southerners who objected to be severely reconstructed, aud wunt to try their hands ut reconstructing Mexico.

AN OLD STORY RE-TOLD.—EMMET'S INSURRECTION.

THE INITIATION.

IN 1803, Robert Emmet, the son of a Dublin physician, an impulsive young enthusiast, who had been for some years in voluntary exile in France, returned to Ireland for the purpose of initiating a second insurrection. Robert's elder brother, Thomas, a barrister, also an exile, and also eager for Irish independence, had met him at Amsterdam, and filled him with delusive hopes.

Emmet was a handsome, sanguine, high-spirited, eloqnent young man, of fine talents, great energy, and chivalrous courage; but led away by impetnous passions to a belief in a palpable impossibility. He had entered the Dublin University at sixteen, and had even then been notorious for his wild republicanism. Moore, the poet, mentions him as his colleague at a juvenile debating-club, and even then in great repute, not only for his learning and eloquence, but for the purity of his life, and the grave suavity of his manner. The students were fired by recollections of Plutarch's heroes, and Plato's Utopia; there were often real wrongs enacting before their eyes; their own fathers and brothers had been slain or hung; and looking across the water they could see French sympathizers stretching out their hands with promises of aid.

From a portrait of Emmet in later life, we can picture him in '98, with his tall ascetic figure, his long Napoleonic face, and his thin, soft hair brushed down over his high forehead. In 1802, care and thought had bent his brows into a too habitual frown, had compressed his lips, and turned down the outer angles of his mouth to a painful and malign expression; but still, bend the brows or tighten the lips as time might, the face was always the face of a man of singular courage, and of acut though unbalanced genius.

In 1798, when that self-willed and reckless but still generous and single-hearted young officer, Lord Edward Fitzgerald, commenced to conspire against the English government, the two Emmets conspired with the United Irishmen, and Thomas, the barrister, was seized with the other Leinster delegates. That seizure addled the whole conspiracy as far as Dublin was concerned. Thomas Emmet told the Lord Chancellor boldly to his face that the '98 insurrection had been produced by the oppressive free quarters granted to the soldiers and yeomanry, the burning of houses, the tortures, and the military executions in the counties of Kildare, Carlow, and Wicklow. There is no doubt that the cruelties of Vinegar Hill and Wexford led to retaliations almost as cruel. The yeomanry, half of them raw lads, flushed with newly acquired power, and savage because their families had either suffered or been in danger, were often brutal and ruthless; innocent persons were shot, and harmless persons were plundered. Juries were too eager to condemn; judges inclined always to death. The chance had come to bleed the rebels, and the lancet was keen and cut deep.

In the prison, well-born and refined men like Thomas Emmet suffered cruelly. The cells were crowded and unhealthy, the jailors insolent and cruel. There was no discipline, and the thieves' orgie was interrupted only by the tolling of the death-bell. In such a den the brave wife of this sincere but misguided man immurred herself for twelve months. The sufferings of his brother and his brother's wife no doubt increased Emmet's hatred to the existing government more even than all the sabrings and platoon firing in Wicklow and Wexford. The Union Bill passed in 1801, after Grattan's scornful and passionate invectives: and Lord Castlereagh's triumph and cold arrogance frenzied the United Irishmen, and drove such men as Emmet to believe in open insurrection as their only hope.

Wolf Tone had spoken highly of the talents of the Emmet family. He described Thomas Emmet as a man of a great and comprehensive mind and a warm heart, one who would adhere to his principles through all sacrifices, and even to death. Of another brother Grattan said; "Temple Emmet, before he came to the bar, knew more law than any of the judges on the bench; and he would have answered better both in law and divinity than any judge or bishop of the land." The heart of the young conspirator, fresh from exile, burned as he heard with perfect faith all the exaggerated stories of the recent Protestant cruelties. He remembered the promises of the French plotters; he did not foresee that Napoleon was too selfish and too busy just then to do much for Ireland; money was scarce, merchants were timid, the peasantry was cowed and scared; the Presbyterians were incensed by the cruelties at Wexford, and the Catholics distrustful of the north. Ardent and impetuous, Emmet had returned, eager to draw the sword, about the same time, and probably in conjunction with, an Irish officer named Russell, who had been released from Fort George after the troubles of '98, on condition of his transporting himself out of his Majesty's dominions, and who now returned with a secret French commissioner as general-in-chief. This Russell was a religious enthusiast, a wild interpreter of prophecies. He was to head an insurrection in Down and Antrim contemporaneously with a landing of the French in Scotland and with Emmet's seizure of Dublin Castle.

To other motives of ambition Robert Emmet now (in 1803) added the strongest of any. He fell in love, with all the passion of his vehement nature; he had won the heart of a daughter of that forensic orator, Curran. Mr. Curran was irresolute in the cause of the United Irishmen, and he did not share in the dreams of the young enthusiast.

THE PREPARATION.

The prairie was ready to light, but the fire had still to be put. Emmet was to plant the green flag and the "Sunburst" on the walls of Dublin Castle, and fill its cellars with English prisoners. The one idea had grown dominant, and he had now braced himself to make the Curtius' leap. On his first return he had taken the name of Hewitt, and had hidden himself in the house of a Mrs. Palmer, at Harold's Cross. There he corresponded with the leading conspirators, and sketched out his rough plans. On the 24th of March, 1803, he went with a Mr. Dowdall, who had been formerly secretary to the Whig Club, and contracted for a house at a place called Butterfield Lane, near Rathfarnham. But their mysterious and stealthy movements soon exciting suspicion, and the spot not being central enough, they soon left there. About the end of April, when Ireland's meadows began "the wearing of green" more luxuriantly and rebelliously than ever, Emmet's friends took for their young leader a roomy malt-house in Marshal's Alley, Thomas street, which had been long unoccupied. It was a retired place, the space was ample, above all, it was central and near the heart of the city, at which the first desperate blow was to be struck. There he lodged, while men were forging pike-heads, moulding cartridges, running bullets, stitching green and scarlet-faced uniforms, hemming green flags, and filling rocket-cases—taking only a few hurried hours of sleep on a mattress, when, exhausted in mind and body, he sunk back amid the clang of the hammers and the clatter and exultation of twenty hard-working associates.

In one depot alone this indefatigable conspirator had accumulated forty-five pounds of cannon-powder, eleven boxes of fine powder, one hundred bottles quilted with musket-balls and bound with canvass, two hundred and forty-six ink-bottles filled with powder and encircled with buck-shot, to be used as hand-grenades, sixty-two thousand rounds of ball cartridge, three bushels of musket-ball, heaps of tow mixed with tar and gunpowder for burning houses, twenty thousand pikes, bundles of sky-rockets for signals, and many hollow beams filled with combustibles. The arms were stored in various depots through the city, but chiefly in Mass Lane and Marshal's Alley. The White Bull Inn, in Thomas street, was a haunt of the conspirators, and there tailors and other workmen were made drunk, decoyed to the depot, and forced to lend their aid. Spies and suspected persons found lurking near the depots were lured in and detained. The volcano would soon burst out, the hidden fires were already foaming upwards toward the surface.

When already the police agents were beginning to have glimpses of danger, and to patrol the bridges and quays of Dublin armed, an accident had almost betrayed Emmet's plans. An explosion took place at one of the depots in Patrick Street during the manufacture of some gunpowder. Those who know the recklessness of the lower orders of Irish, especially under excitement, may eagerly guess the cause of the accident. Some of the workmen, in the absence of their foreman would smoke over a barrel of gunpowder, or some of the rebel smiths would hammer at the red-hot pike-heads, and drive the sparks to where their comrades were filling rocket-cases. The half-clad conspirators were suddenly astonished by a burst of flame and a roar of momentary thunder. One man, in dashing up to a window to escape suffocation, gashed open an artery in his arm, fell back, and bled to death. A companion was taken prisoner by the police, who instantly rushed in. Luckily, however, for Emmit, Major Sirr and the Dublin police, oversecure, were pacified by lies and misrepresentations, and the government took no alarm. The levees at the Castle went on as usual, though there were still rumors of a "rising" that made the Lord-Lieutenant order the patrols of certain stations to be doubled.

In the mean time, Robert Emmet was racked with fears and anxieties. He dreaded detection just as the great enterprise was about to bear fruit. He moved now for the third time, hiding in the depot at Mass Lane. There, with feverish restlessness, he spent all day, urging on the blacksmiths, and bullet-makers, and at night slept for an hour at a time, when exhausted, between the forge and the rocket-maker's table.

There was not yet more than eighty or a hundred conspirators actively engaged with Emmet, Dowdall, and Quigley, but these men firmly believed all Dublin—nay, all Ireland—would rise when once they emerged from the depot, and their young Hannibal had shouted in the streets the first "Erin go bragh!" There was too much of Hamlet about Emmet for such an enterprise as this; he had not the experience of men, or the power of command, requisite to conduct such a revolt. He was too sanguine, too credulous, too mild and tender-hearted, too trustful, too easily deceived by promises and pretenses. He did not know how the nation had suffered in '98, and how humbled it was since the defeats of that year. He was not one of those Cæsar-like beings who overrule other men's wills, and magnetize all with whom they come into contact. Some of his associates, fearing discovery, proposed at once flying to arms; others thought action still premature. Seven days were spent in these debates; at last it was agreed to surprise the arsenals near the city, and take the Castle by a coup de main. As in '98, the mail-coaches were also to be stopped on the same day, as a signal for the country to rise.

Imagine the feelings of this man, to-day a fugitive skulking from Major Sirr and his armed agents, to-morrow, as he thought to be, the patriot chief who was to restore liberty to Ireland! To-morrow the lover of Sarah Curran would clasp his beloved to his breast, and be greeted by her father as a conqueror and a victor. To-morrow England, France, Europe, the world would know his name,—the good and free to bless, the weak and wicked to curse and execrate it. In such a fever of conflicting passions, Emmet drew up an impetnous manifesto from "The Provisional Government to the People of Ireland." It concluded thus:

"Countrymen of all descriptions! let us act with union and concert; all sects—Catholic, Protestant, Presbyterian—are equally and indiscriminately embraced in the benevolence of our object; repress, prevent, and discourage excesses, pillage, and intoxication; let each man do his duty, and remember that, during public agitation, inaction becomes a crime: be no other competition known than that of doing good; remember against whom you fight,—your oppressors for six hundred years; remember their massacres, their tortures; remember your murdered friends, your burned houses, your violated females; keep in mind your country, to whom we are now giving her high rank among nations; and in the honest terror of feeling, let us all exclaim, that as, in the hour of her trial, so serve this country, so may God serve us in that which will be last of all!"

THE INSURRECTION.

Towards dusk on the 23d of July, Emmet prepared for action. He put on a general's uniform, green, laced with gold on the sleeves and skirts, and with gold epaulettes, white waistcoat and pantaloons, new boots, a cocked hat with a white feather, a sash, a sword, and a case of pistols. About fifty men had assembled outside the depot; to these men Emmet distributed pikes and ammunition. In a moment, as if by enchantment, the streets and alleys leading to Mass Lane and Thomas streets, swarm with men clamoring for arms, filling cartouche-boxes, pouches, bags, and pockets, loading muskets, shaking links and torches, and waving swords and green flags. Already the narrow street near the rebel depot is one close wedged bristling mass of pikes, and into the dusky summer night air sprang every now and then signal-rockets, that burst into showers of starry fire. The men are flushed with whiskey, and make the dingy houses ring with their shouts and shrieks of delight as Emmet, dark and determined-looking, like the young Napoleon at the Bridge of Lodi, slashes the air with his sword and waves his white plumed hat. In Dirty Lane, the insurgents, already numbering five hundred or more, fired off their blunderbusses and pistols, heedless of alarming the garrison they were intent on surprising.

One of Emmet's fellow conspirators describes this moment very vividly:

"About six o'clock, Emmet, Malachy, one or two others, and myself, put on our green uniform, trimmed with gold lace, and selected our arms. The insurgents, who had all day been well plied with whiskey, began to prepare for commencing an attack upon the Castle; and when all was ready, Emmet made an animated address to the conspirators. At eight o'clock precisely we sallied out of the depot, and when we arrived in Thomas Street the insurgents gave three deafening cheers.

"The consternation excited by our presence defies description. Every avenue emptied its curious hundreds, and almost every window exhibited half a dozen inquisitive heads, while peaceable shopkeepers ran to their doors, and beheld with amazement a lawless band of armed insurgents, in the midst of a peaceable city, an hour at least before dark. The scene at first might have appeared amusing to a careless spectator, from the singular and dubious character which the riot wore; but when the rocket ascended and burst over the heads of the people, the aspect of things underwent an immediate and wonderful change. The impulse of the moment was self-preservation; and those who, a few minutes before, seemed to look on with vacant wonder, now assumed a face of horror, and fled with precipitation. The wish to escape was simultaneous; and the eagerness with which the people retreated before us impeded their flight, as they crowded upon one another in the entrance of alleys, court-ways, and lanes, while the screams of women and children were frightful and heartrending.

"'To the Castle!' cried our enthusiastic leader, drawing his sword, and his followers appeared to obey; but when he reached the market house, our adherents had wonderfully diminished, there not being more than twenty insurgents with us.

"'Fire the rocket!' cried Malachy.

"'Hold awhile,' said Emmet, snatching the match from the man's hand who was about applying it. 'Let no lives be unnecessarily lost. Run back and see what detains the men.'

"Malachy obeyed; and we remained near the market-house, waiting their arrival, until the soldiers approached."

The night was dark; the excitement along the quays, in the swarming "Liberty," and below the Castle, was tremendous. There is no excitement so wild as Irish excitement. Bands of pikemen were marching to various points of the city, and others were rushing, open-mouthed, to the depots for arms and powder. Already drums were beating at the Castle and the various barrack-yards, and patches of scarlet were moving towards the spot where rockets were sprung and guns discharged.

That night Lord Kilwarden, chief justice of the King's Bench, an amiable and just old lawyer, who had never lent himself to such ruthless severities as old Lord Norbury and other partizans, had smilingly dressed at his country-house, and, trim, powdered, and in full evening dress, handed his daughter, Miss Wolfe, into his carriage, and with his newphew, a clergyman, driven cheerful and chatty to a party at the Castle. All the stories of this good and worthy man redound to his credit. In 1795, when he was attorney-general, a number of striplings and boys were indicted for high treason. The poor lads appeared in court wearing those open collars and frilled tuckers made familiar to us by Gainsborough's pictures. As Kilwarden entered the court, the Jeffreys of that day called out brutally,—

"Well, Mr. Attorney, I suppose you are ready to go on with the trials of these tuckered traitors?"

Generously indignant and disgusted at hearing such language from the representative of divine justice, Kilwarden replied,—

"No, my lord, I am not ready."

Then, stooping down to the prisoners' counsel, he whispered,—

"If I have any power to save the lives of these boys, whose extreme youth I did not before know, that man shall never have the gratification of passing sentence upon a single one of these tuckered traitors."

The large-hearted man was as good as his word. He procured pardons for every one of the prisoners on condition of their voluntarily expatriating themselves. One lad alone obstinately refused to accept pardon on such a condition, and was tried, convicted and executed.

The relatives of that unhappy boy persisted in considering their kinsman as an especial selected victim, and swore vengeance against this good old judge. On this unfortunate summer night the carriage got embedded in the mob; the pikemen soon closed around it; pistols and blunderbusses were held to the head of the powdered coachman, sunk deeper than usual into his seat with fear, and at the heads of the footmen clustering behind. There was a murderous cry, and a pikeman named Shannon tore open the door of the carriage. It was Shannon the relation of the boy that would be hanged.

"It is I, Kilwarden, chief justice of the King's Bench!" the old nobleman blandly cries, as he tried to calm the fears of his frightened daughter.

"Then you're the man I want," roars Shannon, and digs his pike into the old lord's chest. Before it is withdrawn, half a dozen other weapons meet in the old man's body, and he is tramplod under foot. His daughter, alone and unattended, breaks through the pitying crowd, and is the first to enter the Castle, and sobbingly relate the horrors of that cruel night. Kilwarden's nephew was pursued and piked.

Many other murders, equally useless, equally unjust, are perpetrated that night. The savage, half-drunken pikemen, without commander,—for Emmet had no power over them, and they were now split up into parties by the soldiers,—murdered every suspicious and obnoxious person they met. A police officer, and John Hanlan, the Tower-keeper, were two of the victims. Colonel Brown, a man respected by all Dublin, was also brutally assassinated, as, misled by the darkness, he was trying to join his regiment. Ignorant of the precise movement of the rebels, he got entangled in their chief masses, was struck down by a shot from a blunderbuss, and instantly chopped to pieces. All enemies and neutrals, of whatever rank, who were not murdered, had pikes thrust in their hands, and were compelled to follow the cruel madmen to face the English soldiers.

Emmet, an hour ago confident of success, now felt himself utterly powerless to tame the horrible revolt which he had invoked. His men were scattered; an attack on the Castle was impossible. The people could not be rallied to it. They were only intent on murder in the streets, and were beset by soldiers and police wherever they collected. A few brave fellows, staunch as bulldogs, had flown at them, and were holding grimly on till the huntsmen could arrive. Mr. Edward Wilson, a police magistrate, with only eleven constables, had the courage to push on to Thomas Street, where three hundred pikemen instantly surrounded his small detachment. Undismayed, Mr. Wilson called to the rabble to lay down their arms, or he would fire. The rebels wavered and muttered together; but one villain, savage at the threat, advanced, and stabbed the magistrate with a pike. Mr. Wilson instantly shot him dead, and his men fired a volley. The undisciplined Celts are always the same,—furious in the onset, without fear and without thought; in the retreat, impatient, fickle and headlong. The rebels fell back confused over their dead, and opened right and left to let their men with fire-arms advance to the attack. Mr. Wilson then thought it time to retreat slowly towards the Coombe.

Lieutenant Brady was soon after equally venturous with forty men of his regiment, the 21st Fusiliers. He sub-divided his small force, and placed them in positions useful for keeping up a cross-fire. The soldiers were tormented by bottles and stones from every window, and by random sharp-shooters from the alleys, yards, and entries, but they kept up a rolling and incessant fire till the pikemen at last broke, shouted and fled. Lieutenant Coltman, of the 9th Foot, with only four soldiers and twenty-four yeomanry from the barrack division, in colored clothes, also helped to clear the streets, and apprehend armed men, or rebels seen firing. And now horses could be heard, sabres came waving down the street, bayonets moved fast and close, drums beat louder, and then the rebels were charged fiercely, and shot down wherever they resisted. Then they fled to the suburbs and to the mountains. Before twelve the insurrection was quelled.

THE CAPTURE.

Poor Emmet! so passed his dreams away. The great bright bubble of his life's hope had melted into a drop of human blood. He and about fourteen other armed men fled to the Wicklow mountains, and skulked about from farm-house to farmhouse, from glen to crag, from valley to village. As the pursuit grew hotter, and the troops began to come winding round the Scalp, and scattering along the blue rocky mountain roads, the fugitives separated, each to look after himself. Emmet could, it was said, have escaped in a friendly fishing-boat to France, but a wild impulse of love and reckless despair seized him. He turned back from the sea and set his face toward Dublin, once more to clasp Sarah Curran in his arms, and bid her farewell forever. He regained the disturbed city safely, and took up his quarters again in his old place of refuge at Harold's Cross, in the house of a clerk named Palmer. He was known there as Mr. Hewitt. He had planned a mode of escape, if any attempt at arrest should be made, by escaping from a parlor window into an outhouse, and from thence into the fields. But an indefatigable pursuer was soon on Emmet's track. On the evening of the 25th of August, Major Sirr rode up to the house, accompanied by a man on foot. Mrs. Palmer's daughter opened the door. Sirr instantly darted into the back parlor. There sat a tall young man in a brown coat, white waistcoat, white pantaloons, and Hessian boots, at dinner with his landlady. Sirr instantly gave him into the custody of his man, and took the landlady in the next room to ask the stranger's name, as it was not in the list of inhabitants wafered on the door according to law. While Sirr was absent, Emmet tried to escape, and the officer struck him down with the butt end of his pistol. Sirr then went to the canal bridge for a guard, placed sentries round the house, while he searched it, and planted a sentry over the prisoner. Emmet again escaping while Sirr was taking down the landlady's evidence, Sirr ran after him, and shouted to the sentinel to fire. The musket did not go off. Sirr then overtook the prisoner, who surrendered quietly, and on being apologized to for his rough treatment, said, "All is fair in war." At the Castle, Emmet at once acknowledged his name.

THE TRIAL.

On the 31st of August, Emmet was tried, and pleaded not guilty, but made no defense. Curran had sternly refused to defend his daughter's unhappy lover.

Mr. Plunket, who prosecuted for the crown, said, in the course of his speech—

"Gentlemen, I am anxious to suppose that the mind of the prisoner recoiled at the scenes of murder which he witnessed, and I mention one circumstance with satisfaction,—it appears he saved the life of Farrell; and may the recollection of that one good action cheer him in his last moments. But though he may not have planned individual murders, that is no excuse to justify his embarking in treason, which must be followed by every species of crimes. It is supported by the rabble of the country, while the rank, the wealth, and the power of the country is opposed to it. Let loose the rabble of the country from the salutary restrains of the law, and who can take upon him to limit their barbarities? Who can say he will disturb the peace of the world, and rule it when wildest? Let loose the winds of heaven, and what power less than omnipotent can control them?"

Emmet bowed to the court with perfect calmness, and addressed it with fervid impetuous eloquence. He said:

"My lords,—What have I to say to that sentence of death should not be passed on me according to law? I have nothing to say that can altar your predetermination, nor that will become me to say, with any view to the mitigation of that sentence which you are here to pronounce, and I must abide by. But I have that to say which interests me more than life, and which you have labored (as was necessarily your office in the present circumstances of this oppressed country) to destroy,—I have much to say, why my reputation should be rescued from the load of false accusation and calumny which has been heaped upon it."

"Were I only to suffer death, after being adjudged guilty by your tribunal, I should bow in silence, and meet the fate that awaits me without a murmur; but the sentence of the law, which delivers my body to the executioner, will, through the ministry of that law, labor, in its own vindication, to consign my character to obloquy; for there must be guilt somewhere,—whether in the sentence of the court or in the catastrophe, posterity must determine. A man in my situation, my lords, has not only to encounter the difficulties of fortune, and the forces of power over minds which it has corrupted or subjugated, but the difficulties of established prejudice. The man dies, but his memory lives; that mine may not perish,—that it may live in the memory of my countrymen,—I seize upon this opportunity to vindicate myself from some of the charges alleged against me. When my spirit shall be wafted to a more friendly port,—when my shade shall have joined the bands of those martyred heroes who have shed their blood on the scaffold and in the field, in defence of their country and virtue, this is my hope,—I wish that my memory and name may animate those who survive me, while I look down with complacency on the destruction of that perfidous government which upholds its domination by blasphemy of the Most High; which displays its power over man as over the beasts of the forest; which sets man upon his brother, and lifts his hand, in the name of God, against the throat of his fellow who believes or doubts a little more than the government standard,—a government steeled to barbarity by the cries of the orphans and the tears of the widows which it has made."

[Here Lord Norbury interrupted Mr. Emmit, observing, that mean and wicked enthusiasts, who felt as he did, were not equal to the accomplishment of their wild design.]

He then avowed his belief that there was still union and strength enough left in Ireland to one day accomplish her emancipation. He sternly rebuked Lord Norbury for his cruel and unjust efforts to silence him, and repudiated his calumnies. He denied that he had sought aid from the French except as from auxiliaries and allies, not as from invaders or enemies.

"I have been charged," he said, "with that importance in the efforts to emancipate my countrymen as to be considered the keystone of the combination of Irishmen, or, as your lordship expressed it, 'the life and blood of the conspiracy.' You do me honor overmuch,—you have given to the subaltern all the credit of a superior. There are men engaged in this conspiracy who are not only superior to me, but even to your own computation of yourself, my lord; before the splendor of whose genius and virtues I should bow with respectful deference, and who would think themselves disgraced to be called your friend, and who would not disgrace themselves by shaking your blood-stained hand.

[Again the judge interrupted him.]

"What, my lord! shall you tell me on the passage to that scaffold which that tyranny, of which you are the only intermediary executioner, has erected for my murder, that I am accountable for all the blood that has and will be shed in this struggle of the oppressed against the oppressor; shall you tell me this, and shall I be so very a slave as not to repel it?

"I do not fear to approach the Omnipotent Judge, to answer for the conduct of my whole life; and am I to be appalled and falsified by a mere remnant of morality? By you, too, who, if it were possible to collect all the innocent blood that you have shed in your unhallowed ministry in one great reservoir, your lordship might swim in it.

"If the spirits of the illustrious dead participate in the concerns and cares of those who are dear to them in this transitory life,—O ever dear and venerable shade of my departed father, look down with scrutiny upon the conduct of your suffering son, and see if I have even for a moment deviated from those principles of morality and patriotism which it was your care to instil into my youthful mind, and for which I am now about to offer up my life.

"My lords, you are impatient for the sacrifice—the blood which you seek is not congealed by the artificial terrors that surround your victim, it circulates warmly and unruffled through the channels which God created for nobler purposes, but which you are bent to destroy, for purposes so grievous that they cry to heaven. Be ye patient! I have but a few more words to say. I am going to my cold and silent grave—my lamp of life is nearly extinguished—my race is run—the grave opens to receive me, and I sink into its bosom! I have but one request to ask at my departure from this world, it is the charity of its silence! Let no man write my epitaph; for as no man who knows my motives dare now vindicate them, let not prejudices or ignorance asperse them. Let them and me repose in obscurity and peace, and my tomb remain uninscribed, until other times and other men can do justice to my character. When my country takes her place among the nations of the earth, then, and not till then, let my epitaph be written. I have done!"

The judge was remorseless and the government was stern. Emmet suffered the penalty for high treason in Thomas Street, the very day after the trial. He ascended the scaffold with a calm resignation and an unswerving courage. He avowed himself a sceptic. To Dr. Dobbin, who importuned him as they rode together in a hackney-coach to the place of execution, he said:

"Sir, I appreciate your motives, and thank you for your kindness, but you merely disturb the last moments of a dying man unnecessarily. I am an infidel from conviction, and no reasoning can shake my unbelief."

Curran, when he defended Owen Kirwan, the sailor of Plunket Street, described the rebellion of Emmet as a mere riot, but there can be no doubt that if the first hundred pikemen had made a rush at the Castle they might have seized that stronghold, and drawn on themselves a later but an equally certain destruction, after much bloodshed and murder. The Fenians now talk of Emmet as "rash and soft," but Englishmen can only pity a young and enthusiastic genius, whose dirge Moore sung with such pathos—and lament that such a gallant spirit should have squandered itself on such mischievous chimeras.—Charles Dickens' Magazine.

"She is far from the land where her young hero sleeps."

A country editor describing the bonnets now in fashion says: "They have a downward slant that remiuds one of a vicious cow with a board across her face."

LITERARY GLEANINGS.

CHARLOTTE BRONTE'S HOME.

The following interesting account of a visit to the father of Charlotte Bronte is taken from "Old England," by Professor J. M. Hoppin, recently published:

"Mr. Bronte met me with real kindness of manner, but with something of the stateliness of the old school. His hair, worn short, was white as driven snow; his ample cambric cravat completely covered his chin; and his black dress was of the most scrupulous neatness. He has been called handsome, but that he never could have been. He has strong, rugged, even harsh features, with a high, wrinkled forehead, and swarthy complexion; and his eyes are partially closed, for he is almost blind. He said he was induced to invite me to his house, though he saw very little company, because he learned I was an American, and he thought much of America.

Our conversation was chiefly upon religious topics, and he wished to be informed about the great spiritual movements which from time to time pass over America. He thought that the revivals in England and Ireland were accompanied by too much animal excitement; yet he believed in their reality. He spoke of Roman Catholicism, and said that he had seen enough of it, as he was an Irishman. He thought we ought to guard against its machinations on the other side of the water. Roman Catholics could not be consistent Republicans; and we must not trust too carelessly to the principle that Truth would prevail in an open field. The Catholics made much of that, and took advantage of it. He spoke of education in England—that it was all the fashion just now; but I could not help thinking that the conservative, granite-minded old "Helstone" looked upon a great deal of it as sentimental and superficial. He struck me as being naturally a very social man, with a mind fond of discussion, and feeding eagerly on new ideas, in spite of his reserve. My call was necessarily quite a short one. I then went into the opposite parlor, where his daughters used to sit and write. There was Charlotte's portrait, with those large dark eyes, square impending brow, and sad, unsmiling mouth. Barnwell Bronte's medallion likeness hung opposite; and Thackeray's portrait, "looking past her," as she said, was on the front wall. Her books still lay upon the table. There was a Bible of Emily's, and a much-worn copy of Mrs. Gaskell's "Mary Barton," presented by the author to Mrs. Nicholls. This room had rather a pleasant look; but its furnishing was ample to severity, and its only ornament was a little bunch of broom-grass on the table. Martha then showed me into the kitchen for a moment. This had been Tabby's kingdom. Everything was exquisitely neat, and the copper pans shone like gold. It was a snug, warm, crooning place; and it was not difficult to see the picture, on a dark winter eve, when the storm howled over the moor and rattled against the windows, of those bright-fancied children crouching together around the fire, telling their strange stories, and living in a world created by themselves. Here Emily Bronte studied German, with her book propped up before her, while she kneaded dough. Now all are gone; and the old father, shutting up many things in his own impenetrable mind, was still living on alone, thinking more perhaps of meeting his children again in a sinless world than of all their fame in this.

A VIRGINIAN AT A YANKEE PICNIC.

One of the most characteristic sketches contained in Mr. De Forrest's recent novel, "Miss Ravenel's Confession," is the account of the picnic got up by the elderly maiden ladies of New Haven, and their escort of student admirers. To appreciate the drollery of the picture, it must be understood that "Col. Carter" is a Virginian and a West Pointer, a mature, jovial man of the world, with a profound contempt for tea and temperance associations, and with little relish for the society of heardless boys and antiquated damsels. Being invited to the picinc, he goes without suspecting its character, and innocently carries half a dozen bottles of champagne in his hamper, the production of which causes a greater consternation than if each bottle had been a loaded blunderbuss with a hair trigger. The Colonel, however, at first unconscious or indifferent, and afterwards in a spirit of mischief, urges the seductive beverage upon the younger members of the party, to the indignation of their feminine guardians. Such is the situation; now for the extract:

"'Why don't you stop it, Mrs. Whitewood?' said the maiden of thirty-five, with girlish enthusiasm. 'You are the oldest person here.' (Mrs. Whitewood did not feel particularly flattered by this statement.) 'You have a perfect right to order anything.' (Mrs. Whitewood looked as if she would like to order the young lady to let her alone.) 'If I were you, I would step out there and say, Gentlemen, this must be stopped.'

"Mrs. Whitewood might have replied, 'Why don't you say it yourself? You are old enough.' But she did not; such sarcastic observations never occurred to her good-natured soul; nor, had she been endowed with thousands of similar conceits, would she have dared utter one. It was impossible to rub her up to the business of confronting and putting down the adherents of the champagne basket. She did think of speaking to Lieutenant Colonel Carter privately about it, but before she could consider in what terms to address him, the last bottle had been cracked, and then of course it was useless to say anything. So, in much horror of spirit, and with many self-reproaches for her weakness, she gazed helplessly upon what she considered a scene of wicked revelry. In fact there was a good deal of jollity and racket. The six bottles of champage made a pretty strong dose for the unaccustomed heads of the dozen lads, and three or four young ladies who finished them. Carter, himself, cloyed with the surfeit of yesterday, took almost nothing, to the wonder, and even, I suspect, to the disappointment of the temperance party. But he made himself cheerily obnoxious by urging his Sillery upon every one, including the Whitewoods, and the maiden of thirty-five. The latter declined the proffered glass with an air of virtuous indignation which struck him as uncivil, more particularly as it evoked a quiet smile from the adherents of lemonade. With a cruelty without parallel, and for which I shall not attempt to excuse him, he immediately offered the bumper to the young gentleman on whose arm the lady leaned, with the observation, 'Madam, I hope you will allow your son to take a little.'

"The unhappy couple walked away in a speechless condition. The two juniors heretofore mentioned, burst into hysterical gulphs of laughter, and then pretended that it was a simultaneous attack of coughing. There were no attempts to put down the audacious army gentleman, and he was accorded that elbow-room which we all grant to a bull in a china-closet. He was himself somewhat shocked at the sensation that he had produced.

"'What an awful row!' he whispered to Colhurne. 'I have plunged this nursery into a state of civil war. When you said picnic, how could I suppose that it was a Sabbath School excursion? By the way, it isn't Sunday, is it? Do you always do things in this way in New Boston?'"

DRILLING RAW RECRUITS.

The following, from the same volume, is a capital, and evidently a faithful description of some of the duties of a regiment in active service, under an officer who understands his business, and believes in discipline. The writer is evidently a man who knows practically, as well as theoretically, what it is to be a soldier in service:

"During the month of September was formed that famous organization, composed of five regiments of infantry, with four squadrons and two batteries attached, known officially as the Reserve Brigade, but popularly as Weitzel's. It was intended from the first for active service, and the title Reserve was applied to it simply to mislead the enemy. The regiments were encamped, for purposes of drill and preparation, on the flats near Carrollton, a village four miles above New Orleans. Carter applied for the brigade, but was unable to obtain it. Weitzel was not only his superior in rank, but was Butler's favorite officer and most trusted military adviser. Then, Carter threw up his Mayorality, and reported for duty to his regiment, in great bitterness of spirit at finding himself obliged to serve under a man who had once been his junior and inferior. His only consolation was that this was not the worst; both he and Weitzel were under the orders of an attorney.

"But he went to work vigorously at drilling, disciplining and fitting out his regiment. His Sunday morning inspections were awful ordeals, which lasted the whole forenoon. If a company showed three or four dirty men, the Colonel sent for the Captain and gave him such a lecture as made him think seriously of tendering his resignation. When not on drill or guard duty, the soldiers were busy nearly all day in brushing their uniforms, polishing their brasses and buttons, blacking their shoes and accoutrements, and washing their shirts, drawers, stocks, and even their canteen strings. The battalion drills of the Tenth were truly laborious gymnastic exercises, performed in great part on the double-quick. The sentinels did their whole duty, or were relieved and sent to the guard-house. Corporals who failed to make their rounds properly were reduced to the ranks. Privates who forgot to salute an officer, or who did not do it in handsome style, were put in confinement on bread and water. The company cooking utensils were scoured every day, and the camp was as clean as bare, turfless earth could be. Carter was a hard-hearted, intelligent, conscientious, beneficent tyrant. The Tenth Barataria was the show regiment of the Reserve Brigade. I have not time to analyze the interesting feelings of free-born Yankees under this searching despotism. I can only say that the soldiers hated their Colonel because they feared him; that, like true Americans, they profoundly respected him because, as they said, 'he knew his biz;' that they were excessively proud of the superior drill and neatness to which he had brought them against their wills; and that, on the whole, they would not have exchanged him for any other regimental commander in the brigade. They firmly believed that, under 'Old Carter,' they could whip the best regiment in the Rebel service."

GUIZOT AND HIS GRANDCHILDREN.

Mme. Charles Lenormant (the adopted daughter of Mme. Recamier) is the author of the following pleasant sketch of a distinguished man in his study:

"Let us enter M. Guizot's study about four o'clock, when he begins the lectures on history he gives twice a week to his grandchildren. The lesson lasts half an hour. Seated in front of his desk, the grandfather turns to the youthful audience grouped in front of him. Attention, respect, and joyful confidence are depicted on all those little faces. He recapitulates in a few words the subject of the preceding lecture, and the children almost always reply without hesitation to the questions addressed to them. Then this same orator, whose sorrowful voice captivated the attention of an enthusiastic public in the large amphitheatre of the Sorbonne, or quelled the interruptions of a stormy political assembly, suiting himself to the intelligence of his young auditors, traces clearly, rapidly, and in a striking manner, the event and especially the spirit of the events of our history, and he mingles with this elegant narration extracts which he reads from the Memoirs of the epoch under consideration. It is a charming lecture, and we have never been present at it without wishing this history of France, told by such a grandfather to his grandchildren, should not be lost to the public." Is not that a charming picture which seems borrowed from "Plutarch's Lives," when he tells of old Ramaus, who had been crowned with all public honors, devoting life's evening to training patriotic citizens to the country's service?"

DUMAS AND HIS SECRETARY.

The Paris correspondent of the Publisher's Circular has the following odd anecdote of the elder Dumas:

"M. Alex. Dumas went before a court of justice lately under these characteristic circumstances. He had for many years a M. Foutrine as secretary. The latter recently died. His widow and daughter claimed to be creditors of M. Alex. Dumas, and levied an attachment on the money at his credit with Messrs. Michel Levy Frères. They alleged he owed them 850f., the amount of seven notes given by M. Dumas, and 3,577f. with interest, being the amount of the balance of M. Fontaine's salary from 1856 to 1861. M. Dumas positively denied he owed a single cent. Thereupon the plaintiffs (as warranted by French law) challenged him to answer upon oath whether M. Fontaine had not been his secretary, and whether he did not owe the latter a balance of account. M. Dumas made this explanation: 'That excellent fellow, I confess, remained with me for nearly twenty years as secretary. I employed him to make researches for me. He lodged and lived with me. Like everybody, when he wanted money he took it from my secretary—when there was any there. One day his mother was ill. I gave him everything I had about me—it was 500f. There was never any agreement between us. He drew money out of my secretary just as I myself did, and as he wanted it. My confidence in him was boundless, and I must say he deserved it. When I was on the eve of going to Caucasus I gave him money, not because I owed him money, but because I had money and found pleasure in sharing it with him. When, subsequently, I went to Italy, I carried him with me. . . He accompanied me to Naples, but I must say here I was obliged to dismiss him, as the Neapolitan wine did not agree with him.' The court decided in favor of the defendant."

MISCELLANEOUS.

The following is the commencement of the spirited ode, written by Geo. D. Prentice for the occasion of the unveiling of the Louisville life-size statue of Henry Clay:

"Hail! true and glorious semblance, hail!
Of him, the noblest of our race—
We seem, at lifting of thy veil,
To see again his living face!
To hear the stirring words once more,
That like the storm-god's cadence pealed
With mightier power from shore to shore
Than thunders of the battle-field.

Proud statue! if the nation's life,
For which he toiled through all his years,
Must vanish in our wicked strife
And leave but groans, and blood, and tears,
If all to anarchy be given,
And ruin all our land assail,
He'll turn away his eyes in heaven,
While we o'er thee will cast thy veil."

The New York Leader delivers the following keen thrust at the Home Journal's especial Jenkins:

The Home Journal's Jenkins administers a rebuke to some wedding ushers for want of taste. The ushers could retort on "H. J." Jenkins for speaking of "first class" or "superb" music, and calling a dinner party recherche. Pictures or gems maybe recherche, for they are sought after, or are exquisite, or are curious, or are quaint. The ushers might, furthermore, call "H. J." Jenkins to account in referring to a married lady as nee, Miss So and So. Or they might ask "H. J." J. how "all" of the elite could be at one place and a "few" of the same select sort at another place upon the same evening. The Home Journal Jenkins should give his information to some "society" fellow to write up.

"George Eliot."—Messrs. Blackwood, of Edinburgh, have commenced publishing an illustrated edition of the novels of George Eliot. The first volume, containing "Adam Bede," with seven engravings from original designs, and handsomely bound, has just appeared, price three shillings and sixpence—which is one-ninth of the original retail price. Miss Mary Ann Evans, whose nom de plume is "George Eliot," is the daughter of a dissenting minister in the north of England, and was born in 1820. Her first literary work was a translation of Strauss' "Life of Jesus," after which, though she was joint-editor of the "Westminster Review" in the interval, little was heard of her until her "Scenes of Clerical Life," in "Blackwood's Magazine," attracted some attention. But her reputation as a novelist was established by "Adam Bede," published in 1858. She is one of the best educated of the British female authors, having a familiar knowledge of modern languages as well as of the classics and mathematics.

JEAN INGELOW.

The Literary Gazette announces that Messrs. Roberts Brothers of Boston will very shortly publish, under an arrangement with the author, and simultaneously with the issue of the English edition, a new volume of poems by Miss Ingelow. "A Story of Doom," which gives the title to the book, is much the longest and most important poem; and "Dreams that Came True," "Songs on the Voices of Birds," "Songs on the Night-Watches," "Songs of Contrast," "Songs with Preludes," are titles quite characteristic and suggestive. None of the poems, with one or two exceptions, have ever appeared in print, and the publication of the book, which has been repeatedly delayed in consequence of the severe illness of Miss Ingelow's mother—the author having been compelled to devote to her the time necessary for its revision—will be looked for with much interest.

Mr. E. Steiger, New York, has published, in German, a copious work (283 pp.) descriptive of California, its population, and its legal, political, religious educational, and industrial relations, its mining developments, etc., with a survey of the mining regions of the adjacent States and Territories. The volume is prepared by Carl Ruhl, and includes a map of California, Nevada, etc., and a plan of the city of San Francisco and its surroundings.

An important historical work is now in course of preperation, by Horace Greeley, of the Tribune, and Frank Moore, of the Rebellion Record, upon the "Negro in America," and his influence in the history of the country. It is the intention of the editors, we are informed, to make a thorough historical examination of the social, moral, religious, literary, and political character of the black man from his introduction to the present time, and to present the same in an appropriate manner to the reading public of America.

A Fortunate Journalist.—Mr. John Oxenford, dramatic critic of the London Times, and author of numerous plays, original and "adapted" from foreign languages, has been compelled, by bad health, to relinquish that post, which is now occupied by Mr. Tom Taylor. While prostrated with severe illness, Mr. Oxenford came into possession of two fortunes—one of $150,000 from his father, and another of $55,000, by the death of a distant relative.

The City Gardens.—Many complain that the high winds, prevalent at all seasons in San Francisco, debar them from open-air recreation. Many fine gardens are so exposed to the wind, that the shrubs and trees have hard work to maintain an erect position against its blasts. Some months ago, a number of merchants and business men met together for the purpose of consultation as to the possibility of forming a pleasure garden in some sheltered spot, where the public of San Francisco could enjoy themselves, protected from the dust, noise, and wind, prevalent in the city. The names of these gentlemen were: Messrs. Eugene L. Sullivan, M. S. Latham, W. H. Tillinghast, George S. Ladd, E. R. Carpentier, P. H. Canavan, J. T. Dean, T. J. Poulterer, George H. Eggers, Henry B Williams, H. A. Cobb, William Burling, Louis A. Garnett, Henry Carlton, Jr., A. P. Crittennden, John Middleton, Christian Voigt, M. F. Jones, W. H. Patterson, Thomas H. Holt, M. Tibbey, W. A. Woodward, Caleb T. Fay, Herman Michels, Vernon Seaman, L Gottig, O. Shonemann, John B. Felton, S. P Middleton, John Wightman, Jule Bandmann, Geo. C. Bule, Selim E. Woodworth, John Hewston, Jr., R. H. Sinton, Dr. McNulty, and W. J. Shaw. Their deliberations resulted in the purchase at a cost of $200,000 of the house and grounds of Senator Shaw on Folsom street, between Eleventh and Fourteenth. A portion of the garden was already in a perfect state of cultivation, and a large body of workmen, and a lavish outlay of money soon reclaimed the uncultivated part. Beautiful summer houses, aviaries, cages for wild beasts, bowling alleys, etc., have been built in various parts of the ground. The hill which shelters the gardens from the wind has winding walks which lead to the summit whence a beautiful view of the city is obtained. There is a lake in the lower part of the grounds, on which are pleasure boats and miniature steamers. There is a mineral spring which has been pronounced by medical men to possess valuable medicinal properties. These beautiful gardens will be thrown open to the public this afternoon, when a grand instrumental concert will be given by a band of twenty-five musicians. The Folsom street cars run regularly every five minutes.

New Music.—We have received from M. Gray, music publisher, 907 and 613 Clay street, the following pieces of new music: "The San Francisco March," arranged for the piano with an accompaniment ad lib. for violin or flute, by George Koppitz. The popular melody, "The Long Long Weary Day," is pleasingly introduced in this composition; The Little Archer, a ballad sung with great success by Miss Kitty Blanchard in The Black Crook at the Continental Theatre, Boston, words by W. Dexter Smith, Jr., music by N. Lothian; the verses are pretty and the melody sprightly and fresh; "Tell Me Why You Come to Me;" we have already noticed this composition.

Immense Real Estate Sale.—On Wednesday next, the largest sale of real estate which has ever occurred in San Francisco, will take place. Maurice Dore & Co., the well-known auctioneers, will offer for sale at their rooms, the Beideman Estate, divided into lots to suit purchasers. The terms are liberal, real estate is looking up at the present time and the value of some of these lots will, in the course of a few years, be doubled. H. A. Cobb will act as auctioneer on this important occasion.

Crowded Out.—Several communications are crowded out of this issue; "Do I Miss You" by R. B. M. will appear next week.

STORY OF A LOCAL REPORTER.

BY JOHN QUILL.

MR. JAMES DUFFY was the offspring of impecunious but otherwise honest parents, who instilled into his mind many moral precepts, and threw around him more kindly parental influences than you could get elsewhere in a week. Jim was the child of their hope, and often when his mother tucked him into his bed at night, she would bend down over him and gently kiss his fair forehead and push back his golden hair, while in the far future her loving eyes thought they saw her only Jim going about doing good to his fellow-men, and acting as agent for some soup society, and carrying a blessing with him as he went through life.

Thus did this tender parent think she saw Jim, but she evidently hadn't her hand in at second sight. She was a self-sacrificing woman and a good house-keeper, but as a gazer into the future she was a complete failure.

For although Jim had been brought up in the way he should go, when he got old he departed from it and branched out in another line. He blasted his mother's hopes and dishonored his father's grey hairs by becoming a local reporter.

That was his strong point; if there was any one thing on which he could spread himself with a sense of hearty enjoyment, it was local reporting. When he was a baby he would lay awake in his cradle, and instead of playing with his toes, he would cry till you'd think he would burst a blood vessel if he couldn't get his regular daily journal to play with, and when he grew up he would go out into the alley and grab a chunk of chalk and write imaginary accidents on the fence. After a while he went to school, and he would sit there on the bench depressed and out of heart hour after hour until the copy-books were handed around, when he would pick up his pen with tender joy and go in on heavy head lines.

It made no difference whatever to Jim Duffy what the copy was. It might be "Contentment is better than Wealth," or "Perseverance conquers all things," or "Virtue is its own Reward," or any other popular old moral lie, it was perfectly immaterial to Mr. Duffy, for his instincts were strong, and he could no more help sideling across a sheet of paper with such copies as "A disastrous conflagration is a good thing," or "A brutal atrocity is always to be desired"—he could no more help this, I say, than you could help saying "yes" if anybody asked you to take a thousand dollar bill when you were dead broke and deserted by your friends.

He never spoke of summer merely as "summer;" it was a matter of religious principle with him to characterize it as the "heated term," and when he wanted to express winter, he call it the "cold spell." If he went to Sunday school he would come home and creep into his mother's lap, and lay his head upon her breast and tell her what he saw there. But he did not express himself in the innocent prattle of childhood, on the contrary, he would say, "The exerises passed off with great eclat; the elite of the city were there, and the chief feature of the occasion was the magnificent concourse of sweet sounds which was deliciously discoursed by the charming young lady at the melodeon.

These strong proclivities in Jim were developed in his childhood, and although his mother still cherished a hope that she would see him one day acting as ticket taker at a soup house, or as a ladle wielder, Jim was doomed to reach depths of degradation at which even an ordinary plaster Paris angel might weep and shudder.

As soon as he grew up he went and took a job at "five dollars a week as a reporter on the Daily Exaggerator. His mother shed gallons on gallons of actual tears, and his gray-headed sire told him that locating was necessarily a low-calling; but James was immoveable, and he stated to his gray-headed sire that if he didn't get out of the way there would be material furnished for an item on filial impiety.

And Jim was a good local reporter, and the only thing he cared for on this side of the grave was an item. Give him only one item and he would swell over it until he would rip all the side seams in his shirt. For that was his weakness. And he educated himself up to such a pitch that he would fairly gloat over human misery. If a man was only run over by a milk wagon and mangled so that he couldn't budge, Jim would feel as good as if he had just taken a drink of something warm and strengthening. And if any stray boy or other went around anywheres where the attraction of gravitation was strong, and fell off a four story house and dislocated his neck, and expired on the pavement, Jim Duffy's heart would expand with bliss, and he would make it his particular business to send round and give a ten cent stamp to a missionary society as a thank offering. It seemed cruel, but it was his nature, and he absolutely had to do it. And if some man would butcher a fellow-creature, James would feel so overjoyed that he would leave his work and go out and sacrifice to some old idol or other, just to relieve his feelings and express his sense of gratitude.

Jim was so low-spirited when items were scarce that he felt as if he must make some active exertion to kill dull care and make way with melancholy. And what do you think Jim Duffy did in this emergency? Why he would get hold of a little child and take it up on his knee, and caress it and tell it fairy tales about a good little boy who was stricken with early piety to such an alarming extent that he felt it to be his religious duty to go up and build bonfires in the garret, and then Jim would make the child believe that all he had to do to get to heaven was to go up into the cockloft and start a fire among the old rags. Then Jim Duffy would give him a box of matches and send him home, and he would get out his note-book and follow him, and prowl around the corners until he saw the smoke, when he would rush down to the office and let himself out over a piece of paper with "A Terrific Conflagration—Fearful Destruction of Property—Supposed Work of an Incendiary," and then he would amuse himself exaggerating the price of the house that was burned.

And do you know he never felt any remorse over this. Why he actually reveled in it, and considered that he was advancing the cause of civilization and Christianity.

Every now and then he would take a trip into the country in order to meditate upon the beauties of nature, he said, but it was a singular fact that whenever he left town there was always a frightful railroad accident in the very identical rural district into which Jim went. It was thought that he misplaced switches an tied logs on the tracks, but he never alluded to it himself, although it was considered remarkable that he was always the first reporter on the ground.

When Jim went courting a girl, he would sit all serene and felicitous in the back parlor, with his arm around her, in order to soothe her and calm her fears, until he saw his chance, when he would get her to go out for a minute, and then would upset half a dozen chairs and spill some red paint on the carpet to represent gore. Then he would rush out and tell the girl a pack of first-class falsehoods about a fight with a burglar, and the next morning you might pick up the Exaggerator, and you would see about two columns of an account of a "Desperate conflict with a ruffian—heroic conduct of our reporter."

But Jim Duffy, he thought no more of lying than if it wasn't a sin, for he felt it to be a part of his ordinary business, and he knew he must have his regular item or he would die.

And when Jim's father died, Jim laid off beside his bedside, and pretended to be weeping, while he watched for the old man to blow his last breath, when Jim's face would light up with happiness, and he would break for his office and scratch out half a column, headed, "Another old and respected citizen gone."

He absolutely wished he had a hundred fathers, so that he might write an obituary every week.

But at last his own time came, and Jim Duffy was about to die. He wasn't a particle afraid, notwithstanding all his falsehoods, for he knew it would help fill the local colum, so he sent all his relatives down stairs, and got his assistant reporter to stand by him, and he made him swear that he would not give the item to any other paper, and then with a serene smile on his face, he yielded up his life, and Jim Duffy was no more.

His will was full of items, one of which provided that he should be buried in Philadelphia, because it was in Pennsylvania, and a pencil (without a "vania," however) had been his favorite tool. He desired that they should put the last edition of the Exaggerator in his coffin, and bury him with the church service that had the greatest number of superlative adjectives in it.

This was all done, and it is fair to suppose that Jim's spirit will now be at rest unless something of a startling nature occurs in the spirit world, when you can safely bet he will be rushing around among the mediums and knocking on old tables and chairs, so as to get the item into the Exaggerator.

"Views Barefooted! or, The Tour of Europe for $181 in Greenbacks,"—Is the somewhat startling title of a lecture to be delivered before the Addisonian Society, by Mr. Ralph Keeler. The young gentleman announces his determination to "speak his piece" on Tuesday evening, July 30th. He has chartered the Academy of Music for that purpose, and we hope it may be filled to overflowing.

Asphaltum vs. Rats.—The proprietors of the new market, on California street, not content with getting the best of the butchers, are also determined to euchre the rats, and have had the entire basement floor of their building laid in asphaltum by the Pacific Asphaltum Company, under the charge of their experienced manager, Mr. M. E. Fitz-Gibbols, so as to exclude all animals of the rat kind therefrom. The basement of the Bank of California, as well as the sidewalks of both buildings, have been asphaltumized by the same company.

Waltham watches and Ayer's Pills are said to be the highest specimens of American art, each of their kind: one in mechanics and the other in medicine. AN OLD WHALER'S YARN.*

"DID I like the life? and if I had my time to live over again would I make the same choice? Well, Miss Waven, it's about this. It's just the finest thing out—so long—as you have—no flutterings here," and he laid his hand on his broad chest. "But when a man's ship ceases to be wife and child and all the world to him, it is another thing altogether; my advice to him is, he'd better give up whaling."

So spoke Captain Harding, erst South Sea whaler, now, these ten years past, gentleman of England, living at home at ease. Captain Harding is sitting in my brother Henry's drawing-room after dinner and a heavy day's sport among the turnips,—the Captain commonly uses an immense double-barrelled gun which has in old times brought down monkeys many.

Captain Harding is not after our received notion of a sailor; he is sufficiently broad, but much too tall with it; a pale-faced man with a full white beard, he is rather bleached and aged than bronzed by his foreign experiences,—fifty-five, he looks sixty,—also, instead of the sailor's roll, he has an erect, military carriage, partly to be accounted for by his five years' service in our local volunteers, of whom he is a most efficient officer; only occasionally he orders the piping of all hands instead of the assembly, and all taut in lieu of dressing up.

"It is not to say there is any choice in the matter," continued Captain Harding. "Let a boy but have the sea fever on him,—not the sham thing, that a month's coasting voyage will cure,—but the real thirst for the sea, for foreign adventure, and he'd best be let go. I, for example, shouldn't have made half a man at home,—now, however—"

"You are a man and a half," interposed my brother, heartily.

"In size you mean?" and the captain laughed enjoyably. "Well, my father was in a large way of business, but he had little capital,—I should have done nothing at the humdrum, millwheel life I must have been bound to. But he consented that I should go to sea, and I flatter myself I did make a good whaler."

"Self-reliance is the best lesson in the world for a boy," said Henry, sententiously.

"It is, it is. Jack and I, Mrs. Waven, were turned out of the nest to make room for second brood, and what way we have made has been against wind and tide."

"But there are very many dangers attending whale-fishing, are there not?" I asked,—sharks, and all sorts of things?"

"We get used to them. I have seen men sitting with bare legs over the gunwales of the boat, and a shark come sheer up and make a snap for them, times out of mind. He comes with a swift motion, as you have seen a pike. Sharks don't often of intention attack a man. When he is about a whale they'll occasionally take a neat piece out of his leg by mistake for the whale's flank. In my thirty years' experience I have known many men killed by them. And in every way fatal accidents are less frequent than you would imagine. A lot of men about a whale just remind me of a lot of blue-bottle flies about a joint of meat. You strike here and there and everywhere as sharply and as fiercely as you like,—the chances are they'll all escape you. It is precisely thus with the whale's frantic strokes. Jack was less fortunate in this respect than I. He lost two of his officers in one voyage. Parley,—you know Parley of our town, Miss Waven?—his brother was one. The whale brought down its tail on the boat, and he was crushed to death as you would crush a gnat. The other fellow lost his life about two months after in much the same way."

"Now, when you set out on a voyage," Henry asked, "what would be your particular destination?"

"Just where my judgment took me. You see, I was differently situated to most masters. I was allowed more discretionary power. I had, in fact, a sort of roving commission. My owners would say, 'there's your ship, Harding,—everything, we think, in her that you'll require for four years. Now sail as soon as you like, and let us hear from you as often as you can. Whatever luck you have, good or ill, don't scruple to write,—we shall be glad to hear. Then I would be gone from three to four years, according to my degree of success. For the months of our own summer we would cruise in the Japan seas; for the Antaretic summer in the Australian seas. For six years, through coming home between whiles, I entirely escaped winter."

"And how do you find the whales, Captain Harding?" inquired my sister.

"My wife thinks you fish for them with a rod and a line," laughed Henry, "and a worm at the end."

"We find them, Mrs. Waven, by their spouting. With the first of daylight, a look-out is told off, and kept going, relieved at due intervals, until night. Sometimes we go two months without even seeing a whale. Then again, I once killed eleven in one day. But they were shoal whales, and the whole eleven not worth so much as one good sized male whale. A fair-sized male whale is worth five hundred pounds, and some large ones bring in as much as a thousand. When you have secured a large whale, it saves a great deal of trouble if you can get it close up by the ship. This is done by jaw-boning him,—work often falling to my share."

"Why to your share?"

"Because I was always good in the water. You take a rope suited to the purpose, and make a good running noose, as you call it, in it. You stand with this noose well advanced in your right hand, so as to avoid entanglement; your steersman brings the boat immediately over the spot where the whale is gone down; your best man—the man with the readiest eye and most reliable nerve—stands, lance in hand, prepared to pin any too curious shark: at the right moment you leap into the water, and diving, fasten the noose on the teeth of the whale. You know the jaws of a large whale are from sixteen to eighteen feet in length; the teeth are about six inches long, and a foot apart. You can get a capital purchase on these, and the thing is done in a minute."

"Rather you than me, though," said my brother.

The captain, like all truly brave men, was modest. "O," said he, naively, "all you want is to calculate before you go down. Only say I have to do thus and thus, and when the thing is to be done you will have twice the confidence and twice the dexterity. The danger, of course, is the sharks. The rope fixed, it is easy towing to the ship."

"But don't you often get your boats smashed in?" asked Henry.

"O yes, that's an affair of frequent occurrence, and if you are engaged with a whale toward the end of the day, a source of extreme danger. For, of course, there is no twilight in those equinoctial regions,—now, broad daylight; five minutes hence, darkness. You get stove in just as the sudden darkness sets in, and the chances are you perish. For, by the morning, the ship quite ignorant of your whereabouts, may have drifted miles out of sight. Now I did see a brave thing done once in an affair of this kind. You know, ladies, or more probably, you do not know, a whaler's boat—there are three or four of them to a ship—is some thirty feet long and as thin as a lath—"

"Thin as a lath!" exclaimed Henry.

"Three cuts to the inch plank, in fact."

"But I should have thought you could not have had them too strong,—so as to resist the strokes of the whale."

"The stoutest boat made to handle wouldn't do that; so these answer in that respect as well; and they are much more convenient for lowering from the ship and for repairing. Thirty feet long as they are, you and I could carry one on our shoulders with ease. When a boat is stove, we rightside it, lash the oars crossways so as to make a wide raft-like surface,—there are ropes expressly affixed to the side of the boats,—and all sit down to await assistance. Of course we are stationary; but thus sitting down, the weight of our bodies is not more than a pound or two on the boat: the water nearly supports us; if we stand up the boat sinks immediately. I once so sat—the water breast-high—for three hours. Bless you, it's a luxurious position in those climates,—provided your comrades look like eventually coming to your assistance. Well, on the particular occasion I have in mind, we fell in with a large whale late in the day. We were working in an extended line,—the two other boats some long way to the right—with the ship at least three miles to leeward. We are stove in, and, as Coleridge has it, 'at one stride comes the dark.'

"The ship is miles away, the other boats far beyond hail, there does not appear a hope of salvation. The one man gets up from amongst us and says he will swim for it. He does not propose trying for the ship, that is quite out of the question. But he points out how, in order themselves to reach the ship, the other boats must at some one spot come within three quarters of a mile of us, and he hopes, in spite of the sharks, in spite of the darkness, to happen upon their path, when he will bring them to our aid. Over the side the man went, and we waited and waited, and listened and listened, and in no very long time we heard the grateful plash of oars, and they brought us all off safely. I do call that a brave fellow. Our passive endurance was of a very different quality. It was touch-and-go both for him and for us. I never had a nearer—except once, perhaps, when a whale, with a clever back-stroke of his fin, took my left eyebrow sheer off to the bone," and the captain pointed to a very visible scar. "A trifle further, Miss Waven, and I should not be here to tell you the tale; that I I should not, as I am a man alive."

"Yes," said my brother, "there is something very admirable about that man's act. Mr. Kavanagh might have remained in Lucknow with the other brave men and women; but he went out and won the Victoria Cross. Ah! sailors are subject to much exposure, a little excess may be forgiven them."

"Now I'll tell you. I am fifty-five, and I was thirty years at sea—I was never screwed more than twice in my life. Once when I was a boy, and somebody who ought to have known better gave me some doctored stuff; and again on the occasion of my joining my second ship. I had something to remember that last by. As I went on board, a mate says, 'Harding, how are you, old chap?' 'Right as a trivet, says I; 'right as a trivet.' And it passed into a by-word amongst them—Harding's being as right as a trivet. It is a Suffolk saying, you know. I had a plan of my own with my crews. I found spirits in that hot climate did not agree with me, nor indeed, any fermented liquors. So for myself I prepared a mixture of best Scotch oatmeal and water—the water simply poured over the oatmeal, about a pint to a spoonful. I found it very nourishing as well as thirst-satisfying. Now if I had gone to my men, and in so many words recommended it to them in the place of grog, they would have turned up their noses. But by putting a pail of it on the deck, and making a point of helping myself from it, in less than no time I had them following my example; and soon, like me, they would drink little else."

"It is a strange life," said the captain passing his hand immediately over his hair. "When you get into the seas where the compass dips perpendicularly, you expect strange things though. Now I'll tell you,"—his favorite preface—"My brother Jack went to sea a year later than I; consequently, our spells at home timed differently, and we lost all reckonings of each other. I had not seen him for twelve years, and I did not even know in what ship he was. I was second mate, or chief mate, I forget which, in the ship Eclipse, and it was in the Australian Seas." There is a particularity in the form sailors speak of their vessels. I was at the look-out. I reported a sail, and the next minute I sighted a whale. The captain would not bear down on the latter lest the other ship should observe it and, being nearer, forestall us. But, in spite of our caution, in only lowering the boats, they perceived our object and followed our example; reaching the whale first, of course it became their lawful prey. As the boats neared each other, I sung out, 'Halloa, that's Jack;' meaning the officer in charge of the stranger's boat. I had not seen him for twelve years; but, bless you, I knew his build in a minute. Just as I spoke the whale indulged in a few antics, and they were all thrown into the water. We were pulling to their assistance, when it happened that another whale spouted to the right. 'By, by, Jack,' I shouted with a wave of my hand; the boat's head was brought round, and we were off after it in a trice. We did not see one another again for eleven months. Now if you had to tell that in a book I doubt whether you'd get believed. 'A pretty brother for you,' said Jack, telling the tale only a few weeks ago to a lot of gentlemen. 'We had not seen each other for twelve years, and then he left me struggling in the water to go after a whale.' 'Quite right too,' I replied. 'You'd have done the same.' 'That I should,' he said, 'for the whale was worth five hundred pounds, and I knew I was not,—at that time.' Of course I knew he was in no danger; a whaler is, or ought to be, amphibious."

"It ought to be a paying concern, and I suppose it is," said Henry.

"It was, but it is not now. I never went a voyage after I became master of a ship without bringing home from fifteen hundred to two thousand pounds for my share of profits. But now, what with goldfields in California, and goldfields in New Holland," (the name he always used for Australia,) "you can't keep your crews,—men worth having, that. A lot of riff-raff I dare say you could have: but they are not the stuff for whalers. I left it as soon as I found how the wind lay."

The captain told us much more worth knowing; but this is all I remember with sufficient distinctness.

It was a rough night for his walk home, so my brother lent him an overcoat. It was of rather peculiar fashion, and required a little ingenuity in the putting on. When, after a minute of anxious examination the captain announced that the ropes were all right we could not refrain from smiles. —Once a Week.

*This is what it professes to be, an after-dinner conversation.

THE SKY AN INDICATOR OF THE WEATHER.—The color of the sky at particular times affords wonderful good guidance Not only does a rosy sunset presage good weather and a ruddy sunrise bad weather, but there are other tints which speak with equal clearness and accuracy. A bright yellow sky in the evening indicates wind; a pale yellow, wet; a neutral gray color constitutes a favorable sign in the evening, and an unfavorable one in the morning. The clouds are full of meaning in themselves. If the forms are soft, undefined, and full feathery, the weather will be fine; if their edges are hard, sharp, and definite, it will be foul. Generally speaking, any deep, unusual hues betoken wind or rain; while the more quiet and delicate tints bespeak fair weather. These are simple maxims, and yet not so simple but that the British Board of Trade has thought fit to publish them for the use of sea-faring men.

"TALES OUT OF SCHOOL."

OH, our sweethearts at school, long ago,
When our own hearts were fresh as the dew!
There were cheeks of the rosiest glow,
There were brown eyes, and black eyes and blue.
Have we ever loved as we loved then?
(Lesson far from the good master's rule!)
How we crossed lots through meadow and glen;
But we never told tales out of school!

I remember the long afternoon
When the clock slowly plodded to four,
And the bees and the flies hummed their tune
As they swung in and out of the door;
When the schoolmaster dozed in his seat,
And the sun glared on river and pool;
Then how wistfully young eyes would meet,
For we longed to tell tales out of school!

Ah, the notes that were written and sent,
In the slyest of underhand ways,
When we all on our books were intent!
We were cunning in those early days.
I have come to the schoolhouse once more,
And I stand where the leaves rustle cool,
Two are straying where we strayed before,
Are they telling some tales out of school?

As I live, it's my old comrade Frank!
See the rogue! round her waist his arm steals,
Ah, the girl played him many a prank;
Will she hear now, his earnest appeals?
Why it seems but a day since he stood
At the foot of the class as "the fool,"
Then you laughed at him, hey, little hood,
Shall I tell any tales out of school?

How the old time returns as I look
On the village that lies far below—
On the graveyard in yon quiet nook,
Where the earliest violets grow,
I have been to the fair little tomb
Where the long grass is wavy and cool;
Still, my heart! joy for others may bloom!
Whisper not thy sad tales out of school!

Now, the nimble red squirrel peeps out
From a chink in the vine-covered wall,
And he knows what the twain are about,
And the robins to each other call.
There's a ring slipped upon a white hand,
Quite engagingly! (Love's golden rule!)
Sadly wrong that so near them I stand;
But I never tell tales out of school!

RESTAURANTS AT THE EXPOSITION.

ALTHOUGH the prices at the French restaurants at the Exposition are higher than those in the frequented quarters of Paris, they seem, doubtless, very moderate to those Americans who are fresh from the unconscionable charges to which we are subject at home.

For instance, they offer very good beefsteakes with herbs, for one franc twenty-five centimes, equal to a quarter of a dollar in our money; vegetables come to from twelve to twenty cents a plate; a glass of champaign costs twelve cents; a slice of roast beef or mutton fifteen cents; beer or ale, eight cents; an ice cream, twenty cents; and so on. One can, therefore, at a not enormous expense, spend the whole day at the Exposition, and dine for, say sixty cents, very fairly.

GERMAN SALOONS.

The German restaurants and beer saloons vie with the French in elegance and spaciousness, and are quite as "jolly" in their appearance. The groups of prosperous looking, good-natured, heavy Germans gathered about, often accompanied by their dames, the huge pots of foaming beer and plates of salt-crusted pretzels, the long-necked pipes, and the various games going on at the tables, give one a very good picture of transplanted German restaurant life. Here you may have at your order all the peculiar beverages and dishes in vogue with that hearty nation, from lager beer and sour kraut to the brisk Munich beer and vegetable pudding.

RHINE WINE.

There is, next to the Berlin restaurant, a handsome little alcove corniced in white and gilt, in the midst a pretty statue of "The Rhine," containing semi circular stands, upon which are ranged in handsome long-necked bottles, every variety of Rhine whine, from the rare Johannisberger to the ordinary Rudesheimer and Nonemberg; each being labelled neatly according to his kind.

The Austrian restaurant is somewhat oriental in its style, and recognizes in its customers the more fiery and swarthy hue which belongs to that southern and miscellaneous empire. Here the main attraction is that celebrated Vienna beer, which rivals that of Bavaria, and those other dishes for which the Austrian capital is noted.

SPANISH WAITER GIRLS.

In the Spanish cafe you see gorgeously dressed waiter-girls, all black ringlets and sparkling black eyes, swarthy of color, voluptuous of form, dressed with that picturesque ostentation and those romantic folds which we have been accustomed to look at delightedly in the illustrations of Don Quixote and Gil Blas; passionate looking lasses, who seem only fit for some dark romance, but by some unaccountable freak of fortune are reduced to the common place occupation of pouring out wines and courtesying in acknowledgement of stray half franc pieces. On the walls of this restaurant you are surrounded by frescoes representing the rank luxuriance of Spanish valleys and fields and the heavy gloom of her mountain gorges; which, added to the liquid sentences which you hear all about you, carry your imagination to the adopted land of Columbus and all its sensual pleasures. Everything in that restaurant partakes of that gaudy ease which is characteristic of the Spaniards as a race; the chairs and tables, the ornaments of the counters, the dresses of the attendants are showy and unsubstantial.

THE RUSSIAN RESTAURANT,

Passing thence to the Russian restaurant there is a marked contrast; for there is a studied plainness and substantiality about the latter, which also illustrates the race which it represents. It is a long, narrow room plainly decorated, furnished with marble-top tables, and having a kitchen at the farther end. You know that French and Germans, and other western nations never have a restaurant and café in the same room. The restaurant, with these, is purely for eating, for taking one's meal; while the café is for taking ones after dinner coffee, chocolate, or liquor, loafing, smoking, and reading the papers. The Russians unite the two and their restaurant for dinners is also a café for drinkers and loungers.

The waiters in the Russian restaurant are peculiarly dressed in frocks of red and green silk, belted at the middle, and wide bulging pantaloons; as to what is eaten there it would doubtless puzzle a more astute gourmand than myself to tell you; at all events the food is plainer, and served with less sauce and spiceing than that which is served in the French, German, Spanish, or Italian departments. In the kitchen, which is directly on the promenade, is a curiously dressed female cook with a sort of coronet of mock pearls on her head, from which hang chains of various metals, while she dressed in folds of silk and robes very curiously worn. The Russian restaurant, though always full of native guests, is very quiet, and they seem a staid, quiet, sensible people, more grave and thoughtful than their Europern neighbors.

AN AMERICAN BAR-ROOM.

The familiar sight of an "American bar room" will be afforded to such of our countrymen as are familiar with the establishment at home. A large marble-covered bar stands directly on the promenade at the end of our section, and a soda-fountain which is attached, more particularly strikes the foreign visitors. Here arrangements are complete to furnish "sherry cobblers," "gin cocktails," "claret punches," and so on, ad infinitum, the drinks peculiar to American manufacture, and the proprietors are going into the business with characteristic enterprise, as if they were bound to make a good thing of it.

Next and lastly comes the English "chop and steak houses," taverns, beer saloons, where "Allsopp's India Ale," "brown stout," "double X," "Barclay and Perkins," etc., are offered in conjunction with hearty "joints" of roast beef and mutton, so that the English who visit the Exposition are happy.

Besides the cafés and restaurants there are many other convenient rooms for other purposes, situated on the promenade. There are neat little saloons for writing letters and other memoranda, where by paying two or three cents you are posted at a neat desk, supplied with pens and ink, and pay extra for paper, of which there all kinds on sale.

A DECIDED PREFERENCE.—Mrs. Caroline S. Beers, of 242 Eighth Avenue, New York, testifies as follows:

Q.—From your experience in family Sewing Machines, and the work thereof, state your preferences, how decided it is, and add any reasons that occur to you?

A.—The preference is decidedly in favor of the Grover & Baker; because it is so simple that a child can use it, and for the beauty, durability, and elasticity of stitch, which I know to be superior to any other, having tried the shuttle stitch on the same kind of wearing apparel. Where the shuttle stitch would break and run, the seam sewed by the Grover & Baker remained firm. I have done all kinds of family work, from the slightest fabric to the heaviest tucking, and hemming of very thin, light material, such as Swiss muslin, silk, cloth, cloak-making and dress-making; in dress-making I have sewed the whalebone in, stitching the belt on to the waist without putting the machine out of order in the slightest. During the twelve years it has never been repaired. There is no occasion for taking it apart for cleaning, or in changing from heavy to light or light to heavy work; it is always ready for use.

[From testimony taken before the U. S. Commissioner of Patents, on the application for the extension of the patent for the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine.]

THE latest improvement in the horticulture is that of removing the stones from fruits by a progress of gradual reduction, by extracting the pith from shoots and grafting them on stock and their own branches for successive seasons. The experiment has been perfectly successful with the Malaga grape.

THE LATE MR. STANFIELD.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

EVERY Artist, be he writer, painter, musician, or actor, must bear his private sorrows as he best can, and must separate them from the exercise of his public pursuit. But it sometimes happens, in compensation, that his private loss of a dear friend represents a loss on the part of the whole community. Then he may, without obtrusion of his individuality, step forth to lay his little wreath upon that dear friend's grave.

On Saturday, the eighteenth of this present month. Clarkson Stanfield died. On the afternoon of that day, England lost the great marine painter of whom she will be boastful ages hence; the National Historian of her speciality, the Sea; the man famous in all countries for his marvellous rendering of the waves that break upon her shores, of her ships and seamen, of her coasts and skies, of her storms and sunshine, of the many marvels of the deep. He who holds the ocean in the hollow of His hand, had given, associated with them, wonderful gifts into his keeping; he had used them well through threescore and fourteen years; and, on the afternoon of that spring day, relinquished them forever.

It is superfluous to record that the painter of "The Battle of Trafalgar," of the "Victory being towed into Gibraltar with the body of Nelson on board," of "The Morning after the Wreck," of "The Abandoned," of fifty more such works, died in his seventy-fourth year, "M." Stanfield. He was an Englishman.

Those grand pictures will proclaim his powers while paint and canvas last. But the writer of these words had been his friend for thirty years; and when, a short week or two before his death, he laid that once so skilful hand upon the writer's breast and told him they would meet again, "but not here," the thoughts of the latter turned, for the time, so little to his noble genius, and so much to his noble nature!

He was the soul of frankness, generosity, and simplicity. The most genial, the most affectionate, the most loving, and the most lovable of men. Success had never for an instant spoiled him. His interest in the Theatre as an Institution—the best picturesqueness of which may be said to be wholly due to him—was faithful to the last. His belief in a Play, his delight in one, the ease with which it moved him to tears or to laughter, were most remarkable evidences of the heart he must have put into his old theatrical work, and of the thorough purpose and sincerity with which it must have been done. The writer was very intimately associated with him in some amateur plays; and day after day, and night after night, there were the same unquenchable freshness, enthusiasm, and impressibility in him, though broken in health, even then.

No Artist can ever have stood by his art with a quieter dignity than he always did. Nothing would have induced him to lay it at the foot of any human creature. To fawn, or to do undeserved homage to any one, was an absolute impossibility with him. And yet, his character was so nicely balanced that he was the last man in the world to be suspected of self-assertion, and his modesty was one of his most special qualities.

He was a charitable, religious, gentle, truly good man. A genuine man, incapable of pretence or of concealment. He had been a sailor once; and all the best characteristics that are popularly attributed to sailors, being his, and being in him refined by the influence of his Art, formed a whole not likely to be often seen. There is no smile that the writer can recall, like his; no manner so naturally confiding and so cheerfully engaging. When the writer saw him for the last time on earth, the smile and the manner shone out once through the weakness, still: the bright unchanging Soul within the altered face and form.

No man was ever held in higher respect by his friends, and yet his intimate friends invariably addressed him and spoke of him by a pet name. It may need, perhaps, the writer's memory and associations to find in this a touching expression of his winning character, his playful smile, and pleasant ways. "You know Mrs. Inchbald's story, Nature and Art?" wrote Thomas Hood, once, in a letter: "What a fine edition of Nature and Art is Stanfield!"

Gone! And many and many a dear old day gone with him! But their memories remain. And his memory will not soon fade out, for he has set his mark upon the restless waters, and his fame will long be sounded in the roar of the sea.

THE position of an editor at Naples cannot be considered an enviable one. On the fifth ult. four duels took place in that city, all occasioned by a single article in the Roma, four of the combatants being connected with that journal. Much blood was drawn, but nobody was killed. Other hostile encounters, arising out of the same incident, were pending, and the excitement among the editorial fraternity was intense.

IN the hearing of an Irish case for an assault and battery, a counsel, while cross examining one of the witnesses, asked him what they had at the first place they stopped at. "Four glasses of ale." "What next?" "Two glasses of whisky." "What next?" "One glass of brandy." "What next?" "A fight."

NATURAL PREDESTINATION—THE LATEST DEVELOPMENT OF BUCKLEISM.*

WE know of no writer on scientific subjects, or on subjects not strictly scientific in themselves, treated from the stand-point of science, who possessses the power of making himself so comprehensible and so interesting to a popular audience, as Dr. Draper. His lectures on chemistry are positively marvels in this respect; for we have actually known instances where they have been devoured with innocent avidity by young persons, unconscious that the attractive volume was a "school book," a suspicion of which fact would probably have caused it to be thrown aside in disgust. His "History of the Intellectual Development of Europe," while praised by the Westminster Review as "a remarkable achievement in in the progress of positive philosophy," and consisting of a ponderous and Buckle-like attempt at framing inductions from a stupendous amount of phenomena ascertained by science or recorded in history, nevertheless proves easy and delightful reading to large classes of persons who are strangers to scientific and philosophical studies. The author's "Thoughts On the Future Civil Policy of America," resembles, in its main characteristics, the volume that preceded it; but neither possesses the charm for the American reader, that will be found in the present most remarkable attempt to trace the causes that brought about the late civil war, to influences irresistible in their operation, working silently and according to principles of universal law, ages before any of the actors in the struggle were born. The fascination of these books is due in part to the clear and picturesque, though not always chaste style in which they are written—for Dr. Draper loves, at times, to indulge in a little rhetorical ornamentation that would be distasteful to a Saturday Reviewer—and in part to the boldness and novelty of many of the ideas and views presented. But we think that with a certain class of minds the spell owes its chief power to the author's pure and thorough Buckleism—his consistent determination to trace all phenomena, mental, moral, and spiritual, as well as material—if we may be permitted to use these terms in the old fashioned sense—to purely physical causes.

If a nation or a community advances or deteriorates "it is in a preordained and inevitable course." The civil war, he tells us, was not the result of "the passions and fanaticism of the hour;" it "came upon us in an unavoidable and irresistible way." The actions of men "are controlled by the deeds of their predecessors, and are determined by climate and other natural circumstances;" and an appreciation of this truth, will serve, the author intimates, to hasten the return of kind feeling, and cause sectional animosities to lose much of their asperity. Climate makes character; it even makes religion. "The January isothermal line of forty-one degrees, marks out in a general manner the final boundary between the Catholic and Protestant peoples of Europe. To those living on the South of it, an embellishment of worship is acceptable; to those on the North, a more simple, or austere form." So, too, the guilt of crime (if, indeed there can be anything corresponding to the theological idea of guilt in the Buckle philosophy) rests on society. "Society prepares the crime," says Quetelet, as quoted by Dr. Draper, "the culprit only executes it." "Uniformity of climate makes people homogenious; they will necessarily think alike, and inevitably act alike." Any competent thinker, knowing the geographical and meteorological facts in relation to the North and South respectively, might have foretold the results of the war. "A Southern nation which is continually under the influence of the sky—which is continually prompted to varying thought, will indulge in a superficity of ideas, and deal with them all superficially; more volatile than reflective, it can never have a constant love for a fixed constitution. Once resolved to act, the intention of the North, sustained by reason alone, will outlast the enthusiasm of the South. In physical courage, the two are equal, but the North will prevail through its habits of labor, of method, and its inexorable perseverance." And, accordingly, the result had been foretold, even before the commencement of the struggle. "Long ago, writers who have paid attention to these subjects have affirmed that the South will fight for the benefit of its leaders, but the North will conquer for the benefit of all. To convince the man who lives under a roof, an appeal must be made to his understanding, to convince him who lives under the sky, the appeal must be made to his feelings." Again, since everything in all nature is subjected to an impartial and unchangeable rule; since like causes under like conditions, must always produce like effects, we have only to study the past history of countries in the Old World resembling ours in climate and meteorology, in order to be able to cast our own horoscope. "In the Pacific regions," says our author, "there is an American Arabia, Persia, Palestine, Tartary." Hence, "the habits and ideas of the Old World will reappear in the New. The arts of Eastern life, the picturesque orientalism of Arabia, will be reproduced in our interior sandy desert, the love-songs of Persia in the dells and glades of Sonora, and the religious aspirations of Palestine in the similar scenery of New Mexico."

Never for a moment does Dr. Draper lose sight of the great cardinal principle of the materialistic philosophy, nor does he ever weary of repeating it over and over in constantly varying forms. It appears in the preface, in a formula that oddly resembles that in which Calvinistic theologians announce the dogmas of Predestination, Election and Reprobation. It recurs, more or less varied in expression, on almost every successive page. Now it is; "Communites advance in a preordained and inevitable course." Next we are told, "In the hand of Nature, man is like clay in the hand of the potter." In the succeeding paragraph we find the declaration that, "To scientific history, foreknowledge is not impossible." At the foot of the same page, charity to one another's obliquities is invoked on the ground that, "there overrides so many of our apparently voluntary actions, a necessary, an unavoidable constraint." Again: "The springs of history are not, as was for a long time imagined, the machinations of statesmen, or the ambition of kings; they are found in the silent influences of Nature." Recurring to a favorite figure, the author reminds his readers for the twentieth time, that "man is a plastic organism; like clay in the hands of the potter, he may be modeled into many different forms; but successive portions of clay forced into the same mould, will yield casts that are all alike." In subsequent chapters the same article of philosophic faith constantly reappears, with but little variation of phrase. "Political foreknowledge" is based upon a study of Nature; "If there be two localities in which the aspect of Nature and all other physical influences are precisely alike, we may be sure that there will be a close correspondence in the habits and thoughts of their inhabitants;" "if we wish to ascertain the probable action of a given existing community, we must seek for some former community which has been placed in similar circumstances.

We could easily fill a column with these propositions in the various forms in which they recur throughout the volume. Precisely how far the author carries this doctrine, it is not easy to determine, but there are numerous passages that show beyond question that he does not limit the despotism of physical influences to mere physiological effects. The climate in which we live, the food we eat, and the sum of our material surroundings, make us what we are. They determine our mental as well as our physical stature, our opinions and beliefs, as well as our complexions and the color of our hair. Individuals and nations move in a determined orbit, from which there is no escape. Their acts are simply the involuntary effects of extraneous causes, single links in a great chain, the last of which was involved in, and necessitated by the first—and could have been foreseen by an intelligence large enough to comprehend the physical laws at work in the beginning. Man is no longer a wonder and a mystery. He is simply the product of his surroundings, just as a pumpkin is, owing his characteristics and qualities like it, to the soil, climate and meteorology of his locality.

But we are approaching a side of the subject, of which it was not our purpose to speak in the present article. Indeed, the author furnishes no provocation in this volume to metaphysical discussion. He confines himself strictly to the practical aspect of his theme, announces no doctrines except so far as they are directly applicable to the facts with which he deals, abstains from meddling with abstractions, and leaves speculative minds to draw whatever inferences they may, of a psychological or theological character from the principles he enunciates.

In the application of those principles, and their illustration by historical parallels, the author displays an erudition as vast and varied as that of Buckle, and evinces a more thorough assimilation and an easier mastery of it than that omniverous student, his learning, when there is a call for it, having the air of coming directly from his mind and memory, instead of being drawn from his common place book. Repugnant as the extreme materialistic spirit of the work must be to a certain class of minds, no intelligent man can read it without the liveliest enjoyment. The boldness and ingenuity of the author's attempt to account for all historical facts, for national characteristics, acts and modes of thought, for revolutions, wars, beliefs, by an appeal to climate—zones, and isothermal lines; the remarkable clearness with which his views are presented; the immense range of reading and scholarship that is brought to bear in their illustration; the candid and philosophic spirit in which all peoples, parties, and opinions are dealt with; these characteristics, together with the charm of the style, render the volume one of the most delightful that have ever been written on a serious subject.

WANTED, A SUBJECT AND IDEAS.

BY DOGBERRY.

IT is a fearful thing while dependent for one's daily and weekly bread, and daily and weekly washing, and daily and weekly etceteras, on the production of a certain amount of copy for a newspaper, to find all at once that your ideas are exhausted.

Fret was in this situation. It was Monday morning. He sat at his table looking at the white wall opposite. His brain was as blank as the wall. There were two columns to be furnished the Weekly Wasp, one for the Perpetual Growler two for the Daily Rasp and Filer, and not an idea or a subject. A subject is as necessary as ideas.

There was no one to abuse. People were becoming miserably, and for him, unprofitably correct. If they kept on this way he should starve.

He marked idly with his pen on the paper. Nothing came to him save worn-out platitudes. He took a book and read a few lines, they tired him—he got up—walked about—sat down—drummed with his fingers on the table—whistled—sang in a whisper, "rum te tump te tidlle dum, rump te tump te dido," then took up Shakspeare—but his mood was not Shaksperian—his impatience frothed. He gave it verbal expression. He said something wicked, profane. Scribblers often do such things—when no one is in hearing. Even poets have been known to swear.

The moments were yielding naught but staleness, when Stubbs, another consumer of pens, ink and paper, came in. Stubbs occupied an adjoining apartment. Here was hope. Stubbs would talk and might elicit the idea he wanted. But Stubbs was himself just then mentally impecunious. He was written out, and was after ideas himself. He could talk nothing but common-place, "It was hot—he was tired—didn't rest well—no appetite for breakfast—would go down town." He did go.

Fret, once more alone, felt duller than ever. He listened mechanically to the sounds outside, to the cries of fruit-retailers bawling "strawberries! strawberries! ripe strawberries," and "ere's your fine nice peaches, only ten cents a pound." Steam whistles screeched at intervals. There was a sound of monotonous scrubbing from a woman at a washboard in an adjoining yard. Somebody, somewhere sang dismally. An infant in a yard to the right cried loudly, monotonously and steadily. Ditto did one in a yard to the left, two octaves lower. They always cried at that time of day. They had worn dreary ruts of sound in Fret's brain. He heard them and yet did not hear them, just as one becomes accustomed to the song of the bore, or being poor, or any other nuisance.

So passed hours—weary hours. Monday was going. Something might be obtained out of doors. He took his hat and went out. He staid all day. Monday was gone.

Tuesday found him in the same condition of mental vacuity at the same table, the fruit dealers and infants still bawling. It was worse than the day before. Blank, blank, blank! Not a line had been furnished the Daily Rasp and Filer. He was fearful of encountering the editors. Then the two columns for the Weekly Wasp by Thursday? He was also afraid of that editorial ogre. The matter for the Perpetual Growler must be handed in by Thursday night. A few hours more and he would be dodging out of that editor's way.

Then he wrote furiously, desperately, not caring how or what he wrote. He filled four sheets of foolscap and sent it to the Wasp office. He did not read or revise it. He knew it was weak, feeble, impudent and trashy. He would not harrow up his soul by reading it.

"Great Heavens!" said the editor of the Wasp that evening to Fret, as he was trying to imagine himself amused at the theatre.

"What do you mean by lampooning that wedding? Do you call such matter as that fit for the columns of a respectable weekly? Why, that article in print would cost me twenty subscribers. You must be insane. Were you sober when you penned it?"

Fret said he believed he was a blackguard. He left the theatre feeling pauperish both in mental and material wealth. Going moodily along, some one called him. It was Pip, editor of the Daily Rasp and Filer. Pip made the usual common place remarks about the theatre, and the weather, and after an ominous hem or two, thus broke out:

"I say, Fret, you're getting very dull lately; you must stir yourself up. Our paper is nothing like what it was two months ago. It's as dull and stupid as the Daily Door Mat. We want more sharp, witty, satirical, funny, sensational, short articles. If they are a trifle broad, no matter, so long as you cover it up in the right way; you can do that, you know."

Calling in for a moment at the Growler office, to get a look at the evening papers, of which he found a few columns, the rest having been cut out for the sake of the advertisements, there was poured into him the following screed of advice and opinion from that editor.

"Mr. Fret, you are falling into an error, common to all young writers. You are trying to do much too 'fine writing.'

You are getting out of your depth. The crowd, sir, care nothing for 'fine writing.' We want slashing articles, something bold, saucy and impudent. We want something like the article you wrote on 'The private life and dissipation of our city clergy,' or 'The confessions of an antique schoolmarm,' or 'The revelations of a respectable physician.' That's the style; something that will make the hair of the community staud on end while they read. Hang your 'fine writing."

As Fret went home, he passed a fruit stand whereon was heaped a pile of peaches, labelled "ten cents per pound." They looked good. But he had not ten cents to spare for this luxury. A luxury? Were they not rather a necessity of which he was deprived? All that tempting array in the fruit stalls and restaurant windows was to him forbidden fruit. He was accustomed to look at it longingly, for a moment, and pass it by. It was not for him.

He laid himself that night on his couch, tired, tired in body and in mind. It was not complete rest to stretch himself there. There are other things than tired muscles. There are tired souls; tired of an unceasing struggle for bread, tired by reason of a vague longing for something, they hardly know what. The machine must work, oiled or not. The bricks must be made, with or without straw. It was not idleness he craved. Idleness is not rest. Why did men look upon him as an idle, aimless, scribbler? He was sometimes asked why he did not do something practical. He had tried, and had been told he was impractical. He wanted to die. If existence was all to be like this, the sooner over the better. Other men had homes and places of rest. Daily they left those dear to them, strengthened and cheered, for their labor. At night they returned to meet love and affection. More forbidden fruit. Why was he cursed with such tastes and desires, stronger even than with most men, if they could not be gratified?

Fret undressed. His garments were strewed about the room just where they fell off. He tumbled into bed, blew out the candle, and the wick smoked steadily and smelt vilely for half an hour. Unable to sleep, he arose, relit the candle, went down into the kitchen, not much dressed, stealthily explored cupboard and pantry, ate of cold beef, bread, pickles, cake and milk, with the midnight appetite of a Bohemian. Then again he retired and dreamt mean dreams.

Of course there was an awakening in the morning, with abdominal pains, and a poor appetite for breakfast. Again he sat at the table, tired, sick, and discouraged. But the darkest time is just before day. Both the idea and the subject seized him—no, he seized them. He held them both fast with one hand while he wrote with the other. They struggled furiously in his grasp. Line by line he chained to the paper. He perspired. Ink flew recklessly about. Pen after pen was worn to the stump. Stubbs and the landlady heard the racket. They rushed to his apartment. They burst in. He noticed them not. They saw the moment of inspiration had arrived. He wrote, and wrote, and wrote, not only on the paper, but on the table, the floor, the ceilings, aye, even on Stubbs and the landlady. With eyes intent on his manuscript, he called for more paper. Stubbs and the landlady rushed out, and returned with all the paper in the house; note paper, fool's-cap, letter paper, and wrapping paper. He clawed blindly at the first sheet handed him. It was covered with words in an instant. They worked hard, handing him sheet after sheet, as they would feed a printing press. An occasional spare moment intervening, they transferred the writen thoughts from the table, floor, ceiling, and themselves, to clean paper. Still he wrote, oblivious to all around him. As his ideas became brighter and more vivid, of course the more obscure, wild, and uniutillegible his chirography; a sure indication of genius and inspiration. The last sheet was covered—it held but four words, such was the nervous intensity of Fret's mind, giving itself expression through the body. Then he bounded from his seat, threw the last worn out pen at Stubbs, the exhausted ink bottle at the landlady, cried Eureka! and this is the result.

DRAMATIC AFFAIRS.

THE success of Edwin Adams is at high tide, but as it has been at that point and remained there ever since he arrived, it is hard to prophesy when it will begin to ebb. During last week Maguire's Opera House was crowded every night by fashionable audiences. On Monday Wild Oats was performed, on Tuesday Hamlet, and on Wednesday The School for Scandal was presented, with Mr. Adams as "Charles Surface," Mr. Edwards as "Sir Peter Teazle," Mrs. Sophie Edwin as "Lady Teazle" and Mr. McCullough as "Joseph." Mr. Adams made a good "Charles Surface." The character of "Sir Peter Teazle" was admirably performed by H. Edwards, who brought out every point in the character with great skill. The screen scene was very effectively represented, Edwin Adams, Mrs. Sophie Edwin, John McCullough and H. Edwards all acting capitally.

On Thursday evening Mr. Adams produced his play of The Heretic, which he bought of Forrest, for whom it was originally written by Judge Conrad, the author of Jack Cade. This play posesses the advantage of a good plot, and contains many striking situations, but Judge Conrad was too fond of writing high tragic and thrillingly pathetic speeches, to allow the play to move evenly and uninterruptedly to its close. Often two of the characters are marched on to the stage, and there they have to stand for perhaps quarter of an hour, spouting fustian stuff which might just as well be left out. "Adrian de Teligny" (Edwin Adams,) is a Hugenot, who leaves his home and wife in Paris, for the purpose of fighting for his religious opinions. Returning, at the risk of his life, after an absence of some years, he reaches his home on the night when his wife, "Eleanor de Teligny," (Mrs Sophie Edwin,) supposing him dead, has married "Raymond de Clermont," (John McCullough.) "Adrian" suddenly appears to his wife, who, of course, screams. At first she is glad to find her husband alive, then she isn't so glad when she reflects that she a few hours ago took another. It is right to say here, that Eleanor was coerced into this second marriage by her cruel parent, "Marquis de Beaumonoir," (D. C. Anderson,) who is a relentless persecutor of Huguenots. Eleanor soon realizes the peril in which her husband stands, begs him to fly immediately, and is the more urgent in her entreaties as she fears that a meeting and explanation may take place between her two husbands. "Adrian de Teligny" is discovered at the end of the first act, but not recognized by any as Eleanor's husband; he is supposed to be some Huguenot of note, whom for her first husband's sake she is anxious to shelter. Adrian is put in confinement previous to being tried and executed. Eleanor persists in her attempts to secure his escape, and at length husband No. 2, "Raymond de Clremont," becomes very jealous. There are some effective scenes between the two husbands, "Adrian knowing his wife to have married "Raymond," is of course very rude, while "Raymond," suspecting "Adrian" to be his wife's lover, is in a most distressing condition. "Adrian" is repeatedly offered his liberty on conditions which he refuses, and at length is quite resolved that he will either take "Raymond's" life or die. They fight; "Adrian receives a mortal wound, shakes hands with "Raymond," tells him to be happy with Eleanor who really loves him, and is just about to die, when the cause of all the trouble, who has in the meantime been engaged in poisoning herself in her bed-chamber, comes in in a dying condition and the two expire together, while poor "Raymond" stands gazing at them and looking sheepish. Mr. Adams was forced by the nature of his part to do a little ranting, though he softened down some portions of the text which were evidently written to be ranted, until they became rather tame. I don't think Mr. Adams made a good speculation in buying The Heretic, as his part necessitates a good deal of hard work and is anything but a pleasant one. Mrs. Sophie Edwin acted "Eleanor" capitally, gaining much applause. John McCullough had several opportunities for displaying skill in declaimation and did them full justice. This play was repeated last night.

This afternoon, Edwin Adams will give a matinée, and appear in his famous character of "Rover" in the comedy of Wild Oats. This is, perhaps, the most popular of all Mr. Adams' impersonations. In the evening, the thrilling domestic drama of The Drunkard will be performed, and will, no douht, have a good effect on the hardy sons of toil, some of whom, having received their week's wages, are too apt to indulge in "deep draughts of the intoxicating bowl" on the last day of the week comforting themselves with the reflection that they can spend Sunday in getting sober. All who wish to see a supremely horrid "drunk," and draw a moral, should go to Maguire's Opera House to-night.

On Monday, a dramatization of Tennyson's beautiful poem of "Enoch Arden" will be produced. Enoch Arden; or, Under the Palm, a dramatization by "Trem," had a successful run of a week when produced at the Opera House some two years ago. This Enoch Arden; or, Under the Palm is a play which Mr Adams had written expressly for himself in the East. It will be produced with fine scenery and stage effects, original music and a strong cast.

The production of the Black Rook, at the Metropolitan Theatre, proved a happy idea; it has deservedly drawn large houses every night during the week. Everyone knows that this great spectacular piece was presented in fine style on the occasion of its production, but all who saw it during the present week must confess that great improvements have been made. New scenery has been painted, new effects have been introduced, and the music has been partially re-arranged. In addition to these changes—all of them for the better—a new ballet has been introduced in which a corps of home artistes appear, and perform many graceful evolutions. The dress of these ladies of the ballet is very pretty, and the fact that there is a good deal less of it than was worn by the former ballet company does not seem to offend the public at all. The Martinetti ballet company perform many beautiful dances and the gymnasts of the troupe execute some of their most wonderful feats. Altogether the Black Rook as produced this week at the, Metropolitan, must, I fancy, approach more nearly to the original Black Crook than anything as yet seen in San Francisco. A matinee will be given at 2 o'clock, and this gorgeous spectacle will be played again this evening. On Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday it will be presented for the last three times, and then the famous Black Rook which has attracted such crowds of people, cost so much money, and which so terribly aroused the indignation of Judge Deady, will pass away from the San Francisco stage forever. On Thursday evening, the beautiful spectacular ballet opera of The Night Dancers will be produced with all the original airs and a full corps de ballet. The Martinetti Troupe leave on the 10th prox., and are present playing a their farewell engagement in this city. It will be long before so good a ballet company visits us.

TOUCHSTONE.

ITALIAN OPERA.

SINCE our last review, Faust, Norma, and Il Trovatore have been given on the regular nights, while Ernani was presented for Signor Milleri's benefit. On Thursday evening, Ione, which was depended upon for a run of five or six nights at least, failed to draw a tolerable house on Saturday evening, its third representation; and the apathy of the public is a matter of regret, because the music of the opera improves upon acquaintance, and it was rendered with rare perfection by the artists, who we fear, must begin to feel as if it makes little difference in San Francisco whether they are perfect or not. Faust, hurried upon the stage, on Monday night, (since Ione would not draw, and something must be played,) was necessarily rendered in a crude and unsatisfactory manner. Norma, on Wednesday, was very creditably done, except that the voices of nearly all the singers showed signs of overwork; and Ernani, on Thursday, was subject to the same disadvantage, and was marred, in addition, by frequent carelessness in the orchestra, especially among the strings. The finale of the third act, in the tomb of Charlemague, was almost the only number that was thoroughly well done, and it was unanimously and heartily encored.

The necessity, on the part of the management, of giving a different opera every night, in order to draw paying houses, renders it absolutely impossible for the company to produce their operas in a perfect manner, however much they may desire to do so. Both the public and the artists are losers by this "sensation" harharism; the first, in the necessarily imperfect manner in which the operas are produced, and the last, in being responsible for shortcomings, which are inevitable under the circumstances.

The early hour at which we go to press, forbids a notice of Il Trovatore, given last night. Lucrezia Borgia will he performed this evening. Ione is announced for Monday.

WOODWARD'S GARDEN.—These delightful gardens are very beautiful at this season of the year. The trees and shrubs are dressed in the richest green, and even the beasts have fine new summer coats. The camel who, during the Spring, wore a disgracefully rough, worn out and seedy-looking coat, has now a most magnificent one of sleek, shining camel's hair. A number of additions have been made of late to the menagerie. A happy family, consisting of two intelligent young bears and three particularly cunning monkeys, is one of the attractive features. More animals will shortly arrive; a whole cargo of wild beasts for these gardens is now out one hundred days from England, where they were purchased by Mr. Woodward.

BENEFIT.—The members of the B'nai B'rith Literary and Social Circle have tendered a benefit to the First Hebrew Benevolent Society. It will take place at the Academy of Music on Tuesday, August 6th. The Marble Heart will be performed.

ANATOMICAL MUSEUM.—Among other beautiful models on exhibition at this establishment is one which shows every muscle in the body. The members of the Olympic Club and other amateur gymnasts should add to their knowledge of motors and flexors by inspecting this fine work of art.

"THE ABUSES AND USES OF SPIRITUALISM" will be the subject of Mrs. Cuppy's lecture at Mechanics' Institute Hall on Sunday evening.

ENGLISH RAILWAY MEN.

WHAT going into the Squire's service, or, in very bad times, enlisting in the army, used to be to the young villager, is now the becoming a porter in the "Company.' Whittington, had he lived in the nineteenth century, would have heard the bells ring out a prophecy as to his becoming manager instead of Lord Mayor; and perhaps, even as here and there a rustic enlists having a hope of becoming a general, so, occassionally, a man may join the line from ambition. In each case the neophyte soon learns better.

A surgeon now usually examines all candidates for the post of porter or policemen, as the companies are naturally auxious to have strong, healthy servants, and are particularly careful to have men with good eyesight; but, from the higher wages obtainable elsewhere, the standard of quality, with every care, can hardly be kept to what it was. My readers will not care to hear much about this, but a very ingenious "dodge," which was for a long time in vogue, will bear mentioning. On a certain great railway the examining surgeon wondered at the few cases of short sight which came under his notice, and how it was that he let some men pass who proved afterwards to labor under this defect. He had tested the candidate by making him read, at a moderate distance, the banker's list, which in small print, formed part of a sheet almanac hanging up in his office. He naturally took the top line, say—

The Alliance Bank, Bartholomew Lane.

The first man who read it gave the words to the rest, perhaps forty or fifty in number, and every man of them, sharp-sighted or purblind, read the line glibly enough. Happening by pure accident, to change the column once, the doctor was astounded to hear a man, looking at "A List of the Sovereigns of Europe," declare the first one to be "The Alliance Bank, Bartholomew Lane." This exposed the trick, and a scheme was adopted which effectually balked all further collusion.

The variety of callings which send representatives seeking the position of railway porter, is surprising. In one year, on one line, men of no less than thirty-three different occupations presented themselves. The largest number were general laborers; next, and pretty close, agricultural laborers. Clerks and shoolmasters came too, but fully four-fifths of these were rejected. Their coming at all told a sad tale of their failure in their own professions.

The men join either as porters or policemen—usually the former, as so many more are employed—and are sent into the goods or passengers' side as vacancies arise. The pay is very low, about eighteen shillings per week in London, to commence, and a little less in the country, with a suit of clothes. Of course there is the hope of promotion; this takes the form of a change, to a switchman, or booking constable at a small station—the public describe him as a station-master—a goods guard, or a passenger guard. These latter situations are exclusively and invariably reserved as promotions. There is yet another class of first appointments—that, on some lines, of ticket collector. At small junctions, or second-rate stations, this is often given to youths. By way of speaking a word in due season, let me tell my readers what happened to a traveler on the Brighton line. A year or two back this gentleman had occasion to go to Brighton, and, on arriving at the ticket platform, the collector came, as usual, to the door of the carriage. Upon this the traveler in question, as one often does, received the tickets from the remaining inmates and gave them to the official.

"Only nine here, sir," said the man, "and there's ten in the carriage."

"O, indeed. I didn't count them," returned the gentleman. Then, looking smilingly round, he continued, "Who hasn't given me a ticket?"

A dead silence was the reply.

"Come, sir," urged the collector; "I can't stop here all day."

"Well, but, my good fellow," exclaimed the passenger, the nature of the dilemma beginning to draw upon him, "somebody has got a ticket, or else hasn't got a ticket. Did you give me yours, sir?"

He repeated this question all round, the collector growing more impatient, and finally had to pay his own fare all the way from London, besides being suspected of a desire to defraud the company. Some crafty one had speculated on this handing up the tickets taking place, and the unlucky gentleman suffered for his politeness—which, I presume, he had never since repeated.

The position of passenger-porter is usually preferred to a post in the goods, not alone that the work is lighter, but from the chance there is of making money by presents from passengers. I cannot help thinking that the knowledge of the presents received by men enters into the calculations of their employers. A guard, for instance—a head guard too—of main line passenger trains, although there may not be a solitary report against him, will remain for ten or fifteen years at the rate he received when first appointed to the post. In such cases, and there are many such, what but the "quills" can reconcile the men to such neglect? "Quills," my readers must perceive, are presents.

The most fatal objection to a man who wishes to enter the service is, naturally, a tendency to have fits. When a man, once in the employment, is unfortunately attacked by these visitations, it is painful, yet almost ludicrous, to hear how he will try to explain them away. They are everything but fits; or, if undeniable, then the accidental cause is something ridiculously trivial and improbable. It is very strange, though, how the men concur in saying that the night air will produce epilepsy in some constitutions. I never knew this to be confirmed by a surgeon, but I have had such corroborative evidence and experience in seeing the effect of a change, that I really half believe this theory.

The increase of pay is one shilling per week per year, to twenty-two shillings; but, before this maximum is obtained, it often happens that the policeman who behaves himself well gets appointed to a switch, at a rate of pay which usually ranges, in the London district, from twenty-one to twenty-five shillings a week, and if he passed a year without a report, he receives on many lines a bonus of five pounds—a very well-bestowed premium too. If he receive four successive premiums he is entitled to wear an "Order of Merit," in the shape of a stripe, or chiveron, on his arm, and an additional stripe for every four premiums. So, should any of my readers see, pottering about a station, a feeble-looking, gray-haired man, with four or five of these stripes, they will know that in his time he has been a good and useful servant to the company. In speaking of the switchmen, it is impossible to avoid an allusion to their hours of work. In the London district, eight hours a day, on most lines, is considered enough, and at this the switchmen would not grumble, although, let me advise the reader, where a man has charge of several single switches in a yard, the work is far harder than he, probably, has any idea of; while it is very monotonous and trying to stand all day at a row of levers, like colossal beer-engines, regulating the course of several series of trains. The responsibility, as every one knows, is very serious, and it is highly to the credit of the pointsmen that so few accidents, really attributable to them, occur. Accidents, however, will happen, do what we may, even if switchmen, drivers, and all concerned, are vigilant. Improved as railway signals are, they are not absolute perfection; and through them mistakes will arise, and accidents occur—or be escaped by the narrowest possible margin.

At a branch, not very far from the terminal station, a driver once ran steadily on to his main line, for the signal was at "Caution;" as he did so, a train, filled with passengers, rushed past him—his brake just enabled him to stop a single second before crossing the line almost at right angles, full in front of the train. The passengers knew, and could know, nothing of this; but the officials did, and a searching investigation took place, in which the driver vowed the signal stood at "Caution," while the signal-man declared he had it at "Danger"—which is equal to "Stop." At last it was found that though the lever was pulled over to "Danger," yet the arm of the semaphore would not follow it; but, from corrosion or some derangement, stuck at "Caution." Now, here was a case—so recent that I may say here is a case—where an accident of appalling dimensions nearly occurred, and where every man whose duty it was to prevent it did his duty well.

I have heard of a pointsman being on duty thirty hours in succession, but that was to enable a "mate" to have a day off, for it unfortunately happens that, on some lines, there is very little provision made for holidays, or even for rest on Sundays. I believe, however, that the very hard posts will be found usually on provincial lines.

Men suffer much at some stations from exposure to the cold, for although the companies generally provide them with a stove where possible, yet they have to be out so much in the rain, the wind, or the snow, that each winter one generally hears rumors of men being frozen to death or perishing in some manner by exposure. It was not always, though, that the authorities allowed their sentinels the comfort of a fire; not the highest officials are here meant—they are nearly always kind and considerate—but the pelting, petty officers do the mischief, and I know one such who had set his face against any of his men having a fire, even in the severest weather. One poor fellow, whose post, on a bridge, was a very exposed one, had begged an old stove, and placing it in front of his box, managed to get a little warmth from it. But, one bleak day, his immediate overseer came round, and from his temper it was quite certain that the sight of the stove would bring down a storm; so in desperation the policeman threw an old box, which he used as a spare seat, over it, trusting that the inspector would simply pass by.

To his horror, however, the officer came up, and calmly sat down upon the box or case. The agonized policeman politely offered his stool, but no, Fate was against him. The inspector was clearly in for a gossip, and began the conversation in a strain, for him, unusually cheerful; but soon the guilty one saw the expression on his visitor's countenance change, saw him look curiously down to the right, to the left, and at last, as the wood began to burn, jump up with a yell of alarm. He immediately suspended the delinquent, who, not knowing what else to do, betook himself to a director, by whom the knuckles of the petty tyrant were well rapped, and so far from the use of stoves being barred, the men were provided with them.

The duty of the switchman being very monotonous, and as at some points but few trains pass, he has much time to spare, although he cannot leave his post. Usually he becomes a gardener, and very neat and pretty his patch looks, as most of us must have noticed. Let no one imagine that in the metropolitan district there is any time to spare. Failing gardening, he reads, and is often a very strong politician, not usually on the Conservative side. It is very seldom that you hear of any one of the number devoting himself to a scientific pursuit—railway servants seem to avoid such dry matters. I did not, of course, mean the mechanics, who very often light upon some ingenious idea—but of the ordinary railway employee, the highest achievement I ever heard was that of a man teaching himself to write.

I well remember how one who did this was a perfect bore when he had once acquired the art, for he would, on account of the practice it afforded, write notes to everybody about everything, and even amongst his comrades, if he had the most trivial question to ask, would write it on a scrap of paper and hand it to his neighbor—he might almost as well have been dumb as far as his conversational habits went then. But this passing the notes having a very stealthy aspect, used to incense terribly the rough fellows at the same table—for these were not switchmen of whom I now speak—they thinking he was writing things offensive to them, and violent quarrels would ensue. Occasionally a man will keep rabbits, or, where near a shed, chickens; these pursuits are winked at in the country where they do no harm, but are not strictly in the bond. I well knew a man who took to keeping chickens in the shed, his immediate superior not objecting, but, lest they should get in the way of the trucks, he resorted to the expedient of tying each of them to posts, by a long piece of string. It had a very odd appearance, thirty chickens hopping about, each tied by the leg, and one day the highest man of all came unexpectedly into the shed, and saw this queer spectacle. He could not find fault for laughing.

I cannot speak of the pointsman's duties without referring to the accidents which arise in the course of them, or by the neglect of them. These are very numerous, as every one knows, but some have been of so singular a character that, though the list is of the ghastliest, yet there is an interest attaching to them far beyond the mere horror. Of those accidents which have not ended fatally, none strike me as being more terrible than the case of a man who was walking along the line when he saw a train coming towards him (the experienced railway servant always walks so as to meet the train.) As it approached he moved out of its way, but, in stepping on the metals, his foot slipped between the points—for there was a crossing there—and so tightly was it instantly jammed, that no force he could use would extricate it. The driver saw him, and blew his whistle, but the unfortunate fellow could not move, and so, with great presence of mind, he leant outside the rails, and awaited the amputation which was inevitable; had he leant inside, of course he would have been cut to pieces, but the train thundered by, and left him lying on the "six foot" space with half his leg crushed off.

With regard to walking so as to meet the train, I once knew a man killed by not knowing that, owing to some obstruction, the trains were that day running on a single line. Thus, while he must have heard the whistle, and the approaching train, yet, as he was on the off track he did not believe the down train could be whistling for him. But it was so, and he was killed.

When a policeman or other servant gets disabled by accident from following his usual duties, it is common for the company to find him some quicker task, such as watching the gate of a level crossing where there is no great traffic. There are not many level crossings made now, and I wonder much that any were ever made,—they are very dangerous. An acquaintance of mine had the narrowest escape at one that I ever heard of. He was driving in a little four-wheeled pony-chaise, and coming to the railway crossing drove over, as he had done scores of times before, but as he cleared the farther line a passenger train swept round the sharp curve very close upon him. He felt a bump and jerk, but did not at the moment know that the engine had actually struck the back of his chaise and knocked a portion clean off.

In speaking of accidents I am reminded of one which occurred to a goods guard, and was a remarkable instance of the tenacity of life—indeed, the most remarkable that I ever heard spoken of amongst railway men. As I do not remember to have seen this in print, and as it was really wonderful, I may be excused for relating the fearful details. This guard was a man named Jenkins, employed on a line in the South Wales country, and while his train—a coal train—was descending a bank, or incline, it was his duty to jump from truck to truck and put down the brake; but in doing this one day, he slipped between the trucks and the train ran over him, cutting his left arm quite off, and crushing his left leg. Unable to rise or crawl away at first, he lay there writhing, until a passenger train came up and ran over the poor fellow. Strange to say, this second shock gave him sufficient energy to creep partly across the line, but horrible enough, only to get in the way first of a passenger, and then of a goods train, on the other line, every coach and truck of which in succession passed over him, yet there he lay and lived till six hours after he received his first injury. He expired about half an hour after he was found.

I think I had better not extend this catalogue, though I have said little of switchmen, and I had meant it to be much longer; yet I know of one very important accident which might have happened. A man, who is still a stout and good servant of the company in whose employ he has been for some thirty years, was on duty one night on the platform where he is still stationed, when the London train came in. Among the passengers was one gentleman who missed his footing at the carriage-door just as the train was about to start, and fell between the platform and the wheels. At that instant the train moved on. Another moment and all would have been over, but a strong hand seized him and twitched him on to the platform; so with no worse injury than a fright and a shaking, the passenger went his way.

Had that ticket collecter not been there, or had he been less ready, the history of the world would have read, no man can say how differently; for the traveler was—Louis Napoleon.—Cassell's Magazine.

MILLINERY AND HEAD-DRESSES.—Mrs. Winship has just received, per last steamer, the latest Parisian Millinery Goods and Laces for HEAD-DRESS, consisting in part of Breakfast Caps, Point Application, Lace Valenciumes, and the Widow's Rooche, worn by the crown heads of Europe, and the only first imported to the Pacific Coast. Queen Emma, while here, replenished her wardrobe from the stock then and now on hand, at MRS. WINSHIP, No. 23 Post Street, under the Mechanics' Institute. Through the influence of Queen Emma, Mrs. Winship has filled quite a number of orders for the foreign population of Honolulu. The ladies of San Francisco should call and examine these beautiful Goods, by which means they will secure the Latest Fashionable Styles.

MAYER'S BAZAAR.—R. Mayer offers at his Bazaar, corner Pine and Montgomery streets, the greatest variety of jewelry, watches, silver plated ware, guitars, music boxes; concertinas, accordeous, opera glasses, etc., etc., to the public of San Francisco, and to the country trade, at prices that defy competition, and is determined to close out his present stock at greatly reduced rates. His heavy case silver watches from the American Watch Company are superior to anything ever before offered to the public. These watches are taking the place of heavy gold watches from the fact that the workmanship is superior, the casings pure silver, and the prices low. The sale of these watches is very extensive on the Pacific coast. Another proof that American manufactures can beat the world. The works are made of platina and never get out of repair. French opera glasses of great power for sale or hire, and all kinds of musical instruments, eight day family clocks, etc. This is a rare chance to invest your money to advantage, at Mayer's Bazaar, southeast corner of Montgomery and Pine streets.

N. B.—An immense assortment of Japanese curiosities for sale.

WAGONS.

MILLS & EVANS, IMPORTERS OF THOROUGH-BRACE Wagons, light express, two and three spring Wagons, suitable for milk-men and furniture dealers, and others wishing light and durable Wagons. Their Wagons are made expressly for the California market, and Mills & Evans' is the only firm which receives Wagons from the celebrated manufactory of A. W. Sanborn & Co., Manchester, N. H. This latter firm stands A No. I in the east, and their wagons have stood the test of our California climate, and are sold by Mills & Evans fifty per cent. lower than any other establishment on the Pacific coast. Call and examine their Wagons, at No. 587 Market street, opposite the Metropolitan market.

MEDICAL.—"YOUNG MAN'S FRIEND AND PROTECTOR," an Association for beneficent objects, Young men should inform themselves in relation to it, and by applying to, the ACTUARY, Dr. Bourne, 10 Masonic Temple, Post street, they will be furnished with Prospectus.

☞ WONDERFUL BUT TRUE.—MADAME REMINGTON, the world renowned Astrologist and Somnambulistic Clairvoyant, while in a clairvoyant state, delineates the very features of the person you are to marry, and by the aid of an instrument of intense power, known as the Psychomotrope, guarantees to produce a perfect and life like picture of the future husband or wife of the applicant, with date of marriage, occupation, leading traits of character, etc. This is no imposition, as testimonials without number can assert. By stating place of birth, age, disposition, color of eyes and hair, and enclosing fifty cents and stamped envelope addressed to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail, together with desired information.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

A HEROIC "POM."

Some prairie editor in the Eastern prairies, near Julesburg, has brightened up his classics and produced the following on

THE FATE OF MR. LO.

There was an Indian, Mr. Lo,
Went forth to hunt the buf-fa-lo.

He wore his hair upon a raise,
With riugs of paint around his eyes.

Now Mr. Lo a bottle had
Of whisky which was devilish bad—

The kind that Indian traders sell,
And only fit to drink in—(MS. illegible.)

And as he rode he drank and drank,
Till foundered on the ground he sank.

The whisky burned him like a torch,
And through his side a hole did scorch;

And from his side, and through the hole,
Upward and onward went his soul,

Unto the happy hunting gronnds,
Where Indiau fun iu stacks abounds—

Where all the rivers rush with rnm,
And Indians fight and hunt and bum.

And as upon the ground he lay,
The wolves came there, both white and gray.

Cayote, prairie dog and owl,
With bark and yelp, and hoot and howl.

For this departed child of sin
These raging beasts all waded in.

Bnt he was pickled through, by dod!
With stuff that kills at forty rod.

So as they came, with yell and squall,
The forty rod did slay them all.

This was the end of Mr. Lo;
Now I must git and you may go.

HIS OLD ENEMY.—As the Van Amburgh procession of ferocious animals was slowly filing through the streets, the other day, a "hunky boy," in striped trowsers and short-tailed coat, stood upon the sidewalk, with his hands rammed deeply in his breeches pockets, his hat coched knowingly on one side of his round bullet head, and a cigar, at extreme elevation, sticking out of the corner of his mouth. As a cage on which was painted an awfully spirited Bengal tiger, was moving by, the "hunky boy" remarked: "There is my deadly enemy. I have spent two fortunes in feeding that infernal beast."

AT a marriage celebrated in a dissenting place of worship, immediately upon the arrival of the bridegroom, "See, the conquering hero comes!" was played upon the organ. Perhaps a different song would be appropriate a few weeks after the marriage.

A YOUNG gentleman speaking of a young beauty's fashionable yellowish hair, called it pnre gold. It ought to be, quoth Mr. K——, it looks like twenty four carrots.

"Clever One."—They had down in Florida, not long since, and perhaps have now, a shrewd old fellow known as "Old Hunter." Everybody knew him. He was as deaf as a post, and through his deafness and shrewdness, he managed completely to hide his sympathy for either party during the war. It was suspected, however, that he was with the Confederates in heart, and that though his house was guarded by Union troops, he sold as many supplies to one as to the other, for he dealt in "stores." Every means had been tried by the Union officers to procure some admission of preference, but of no avail. When reduced to a corner, he never lacked an expedient to get himself out. But one day a Union captain put up a bet that he could trap him and get his secret. He accordingly went up to Hunter's, and skirmished around, but not one hint could he get. He would be deaf to questions that were unpleasant, and the inquirer was baffled. At last, there came two large bull-dogs into his store—fierce fellows, and exactly alike.

"Fine dogs, these," yelled the inquisitor in his ear.

"Yes," was the reply.

"What are their names?" in the same loud tone.

"Why," said the old man, "I call one Beauregard and t'other McClellan."

"You do!" shonted the inquirer; "which one do you like the best?"

"Hey?" queried Hunter, putting down his ear.

"Which do you like best?" was repeated.

"Oh, wall," said he with a twinkle in his eyes, "both of them are as ugly as the devil."

The captain paid the bet.

On another occasion a party were drinking in his store, when one of them taking advantage of the old man's deafness, proposed a toast:

"Here's to Old Hunter, the two sided old villain; may he be kicked to death by mules, and his body sunk in the sea a hundred fathoms deep. May no prayer be said over him, and may his blind soul wander rayless through all eternity."

The toast was drank in great glee, in which the old man joined.

"The same to yourselves, gentlemen," said he, "the same to yourselves, gentlemen."

Of course he had not heard a word that was said.

GRAND TRIAL ....OF.... SEWING MACHINES.

CONTEST BETWEEN THE FLORENCE AND WILLCOX & GIBBS.

THE WILLCOX & GIBBS TRIUMPHANT!

At the Great UNION FAIR, held at Island Park, between Albany and Troy, in September, two Premiums were offered on Sewing Machines, one for the BEST and the other for the "Second Best"—competition being open to the State.

On the first day of the Fair, the Troy Agent of Florence Sewing Machine Company, having, jointly with the Albany Agent of the same Machine, entered it for competition, published in the Troy Daily Times a challenge to Agents of other Sewing Machines, to meet them at said Fair and compete with them for the Premium.

The challenge was accepted by the Troy and Albany Agents of the Willcox and Gibbs Machine.

Each party was to prepare and subject to the judges a "list" of the several "points of merit" on account of which "superiority" was claimed. These "points" were to be separately considered, thoroughly investigated and practically tested, by work done then and there, upon each of the machines; and then decided in favor of the machine which was adjudged to excel on that "point."

Finally it was agreed that the machine which, at the conclusion of the trial, should be found to have the greatest number of those "points" decided in its favor should be decided the "BEST SEWING MACHINE," and awarded the FIRST PREMIUM.

The result of the trial was, that the

WILLCOX & GIBBS WON THE VICTORY

and the prize, by the extraordinary superiority of thirty-five points, decided in its favor, against two points in favor of the Florence.

Full notes were taken of the trial.

It is a fact worthy of remark, that during the entire trial—which continued without intermission for nearly seven hours—not a stitch was missed, nor the thread once broken, nor a needle broken or bent, by the Willcox and Gibbs machine. No kind of work was attempted to be done on it that was not accompliseed, and done in a perfect and workmanlike manner; and no effort was made on it that was not entirely successful; while neither of these statements can be truly made in favor of the Florence.

This remarkable trial can not fail, through the facts developed by it, to be productive of important results. It has raised the veil and exposed to public view the true character of the opposition, who will no longer be able to deceive the public by misrepresenting the character and merits of the Willcox and Gibbs machine.

It is an improvement on double thread machines; and its "stitch," which was severely tested by the Judges, was decided to be much stronger and less liable to rip in use or wear than the "Lock Stitch."

It is the simplest in construction—does the greatest variety of work—makes no noise—is not liable to get out of order—costs the least money, and gives the the best satisfaction.

☞ Full reports of this trial sent free to any address.

☞ Country Agents solicited.

TWO SUNDAYS.

I

A baby, alone, in a lowly door,
Which climbing woodbine made still lower,
Sat playing with lilies in the sun;
The loud church-bells had just begun;
The kitten pounced in the sparkling grass
At stealthy spiders that tried to pass;
The big watch-dog kept a threatening eye
On me, as I lingered, walking by.

The lilies grew high, and she reached up
On tiny tip-toes to each gold cup;
And laughed aloud, and talked, and clapped
Her small brown hands, as the tough stems snapped,
An flowers fell, till the broad hearth-stone
Was covered, and only the topmost one
Of the lilies left, In sobered glee
She said to herself, "That's older than me!"

II.

Two strong men, through the lovely bower,
With uneven steps the baby bore;
They had set the bier on the lily bed;
The lily she left was crushed and dead;
The slow sad bells had just begun;
The kitten crouched, afraid in the sun;
And the poor watch-dog, in bewildered pain,
Took no notice of me as I joined the train.

Miss Wilkes was a beautiful blonde, and she wanted to go to Scarborough—so she told her mother to look for something very particular for her dear papa.

"And what is it, pray," asked her mother, "that you so much wish to find for your dear papa?"

"A son-in-law," was the gentle reply of the blushing maiden.

The sewers of Paris have an aggregate length of two hundred and ninety-two miles. They are kept clean by means of boats—or in the smaller sewers, cars on rails—armed in front with a desk which fits the sewer like a piston, the whole being propelled through the sewer by a current of water.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla

TO

Purify the Blood.

NOT A FEW OF THE WORST DISORDERS THAT afflict mankind arise from the corruption that accumulates in the blood. Of all the discoveries that have been made to purge it out, none have been found which could equal in effect AYER'S COMPOUND EXTRACT OF SARSAPARILLA. It cleanses and renovates the blood, instills the vigor of health into the system and purges out the humors which make disease. It stimulates the healthy functions of the body, and expels the disorders that grow and rankle in the blood. Its extraordinary virtues are not yet widely known, but, when they are, it will no longer be a question what remedy to employ in the great variety of afflicting diseases that require an alterative remedy. Such a remedy, that could be relied on, has long been sought for, and now, for the first time, the public have one on which they can depend. Our space here does not admit certificates to show its effects. But the trial of a single bottle will show to the sick that it has virtues surpassing anything they have ever taken. Sufferers from Scrofula, Scrofulous Swellings and Sores, try it and see the rapidity with which it cures. Skin Diseases, Pimples Pustules, Blotches, Eruptions, etc., are soon cleaned out of the system.

St. Anthony's Fire, Rose or Erysipelas, Tetter or Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Ringworm, etc., should not be borne while they can be so speedily cured by AYER'S SARSAPARILLA.

Syphilis or Venereal Disease is expelled from the system by the prolonged use of this SARSAPARILLA, and the patient is left as healthy as if he never had the disease.

Female Diseases are caused by Scrofula in the blood, and are generally soon cured by this EXTRACT OF SARSAPARILLA. Price $1 per bottle, or 6 bottles for $5.

For all the purposes of a family physic, take AYER'S CATHARTIC PILLS, which are everywhere known to be the best purgative that is offered to the American People.

Prepared by DR. J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass., and sold by all Druggists and dealers in medicine everywhere.

616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco.

For the treatment of Sexual and Seminal Diseases, such as gonorrhœa, gleet, stricture, syphilis in all its forms, seminal weakness, impotency, &c. Skin Diseases, (of years' standing,) and Ulcerated legs, successfully treated.

HORRIBLE DISEASES.

How many thousands of persons both male and female are there who are suffering out a miserable existence from the effects of secret indulgence, or from virus absorbed into the system. Look at their pallid, emaciated and disfigured faces, and their broken constitutions, disqualifying them for the happiness of marriage or the enjoyment of life. In this horrid situation thousands suffer until death closes the scene. Let parents, guardians and friends, attend to those who are suffering with any of these horrible, life-destroying maladies—see that they are cared for and cured before it be too late. Send them to Dr. Gibbon, a physician who has made private diseases his especial study for years, and who is certain to cure the most inveterate cases without mercury or any injurious drugs. It is important to those who are afflicted, to be careful of the many pretended Doctors who infest all cities, publishing their skill in curing all diseases in a few days, imposing upon the public by using the names of eminent physicians from Europe and other places. Be therefore careful and make strict inquiry, or you may fall into the hands of these charlatans.

Syphilis is syphilis the world over; so is smallpox, consumption, and other diseases, to the contrary of what quacks may say.

SEMINAL WEAKNESS.

Seminal weakness the consequent of self abuse. This solitary vice, or depraved sexual indulgence, is practiced by the youth of both sexes to an almost unlimited extent, producing with unerring certainty the following train of morbid symptoms, unless combatted by scientific medical measure; sallow countenances, dark spots under the eyes, pain in the head, ringing in the ears, noise like the rustling of leaves and rattling of chariots, uneasines about the loins, weakness of the limbs, confused vision, blunt intellect, loss of confidence, diffidence in approaching strangers, a dislike to form new acquaintances, a disposition to shun society, loss of memory, hectic flushes, pimples and various eruptions about the face, furred tongue, fetid breath, coughs, consumption, night sweats, monomania, and frequent insanity. If relief be not obtained, should apply immediately, either in person or by letter, and have a cure effected by his new and scientific mode of treating this complaint, which never fails of effecting a quick and radical cure. Dr. G. will give $100 to any person who will prove satisfactorily to him that he was cured by either of the San Francisco quacks.

Dr. Gibbon is responsible, and will give each patient a written instrument binding himself to effect a radical and permanent cure or make no charge.

Persons at a distance may be cured at home by addressing a letter to Dr. Gibbon, stating case, symptoms, length of time the disease has continued, and have medicine promptly forwarded, free from damage and curiosity, to any part of the country, with full and plain directions for use, for ten dollars, sent in a registered letter, or through Wells, Fargo & Co.

Address DR. J. F. GIBBON, 616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco, Postoffice Box 252.

CAUTION TO THE UNFORTUNATE.

Beware of the San Francisco quacks and pretenders who with bogus sworn-to certificates, dupe the unwary. Some of the self styled doctors whose names are to be found in all the daily and weekly papers of San Francisco and other places, are tradesmen, and become too lazy to work at their trade. Some are tinsmiths, shoemakers, newspaper carriers, intelligence offices keepers, etc. Look over the San Francisco City Directory and you will find their former occupation in it. Look at the Directory for 1862-63. The only way to avoid imposition is make inquiry—it will cost you nothing and may save you many regrets, for advertising physicians in eight cases out of ten are bogus, there is no safety in trusting any of them till you know who and what they are. Dr. Gibbon does not deceive people by exhibiting bogus titles, certificates, pretended patients' letters, etc. Dr. Gibbon Will satisfy persons who may call at his office of his ability to treat diseases that he proposes to cure.

☞ Persons writing to Dr. Gibbon will Please state the name of the paper they see his advertisement in.

BABBITTONIAN,

OR SELF-TEACHING

PENMANSHIP!

The System of Babbitonian Penmanship is pre-eminently self-instructing. With its ample explanations of right and wrong forms—its sixty wood cuts—its plain intelligent rules, one may sit down by his own fireside and become a finer Penman than he could at much greater cost in the usual way with a living teacher.

There is a great demand for fine Penmen in the commercial world, and this system, at a trifling expense, imparts a skilful command of the Pen, worth hundreds of dollars to the fortunate possessor.

Penmanship is an indispensable accomplishment to Ladies, and this system is elaborate in a series of elegant copies in the Ladies' Style.

Business men have sometimes lost thousands of dollars from ignorance in regard to Business forms, and there is furnished in a set, without additional charge, a fine variety of Business Forms and Abbreviations. To sum up the Excellencies of this System, it is—

1—Scentific in its Arraugement of Principles;
2—Artistic in its Movements and Flourishes;
3—Practical in its Combinations and Applications;
4—Stylish in its neat and chaste Gracefulness;
5—Superior for Legibility, Rapidity and Beauty;
6—Most Disciplinary for fingers, Arms and Muscles.
7—Unexcelled for Comprehensiveness and Simplicity.
8—Complete and Self-Teaching for Private Learners;
9—Time, Labor and Expense Saving for Pupils and Teachers.

The Babbitonian Penmanship

Is published on durable card-board slips, ninety-two copies illustrated, put in a neat package with a Chart, the whole complete at the low price of $1 50.

Babbittonian Pens.

One reason why the country is flooded with poor Pens is that they are generally made by mechanics, rather than by artistic and experienced Penmen, the only parties really understanding the requirements of a good article.

The Babbittonian Pens,

Made in the most finished style, by skilful artisans, after models prepared according to the combined wisdom and experience of several amateurs and old Professors of Penmanship, are admirably adapted to meet the public wants.

The Babbittonian Ladies' Pen,

Is one of the most exquisite little instruments for delicate writing ever constructed.

The Babbittonian Extra Fine Pen,

Is pronounced by a large number of Penmen to be more free, more durable, and more varied in capacity for either fine or coarse strokes than any foreign Pen whatever. Suitable for elegant writing, it is a great favorite with the ladies and gentlemen.

The Babbittonian Business Pen,

Having great freedom and variety of movement, is unequaled for general business or school purposes. Somewhat coarser than the Extra Fine, it wears longer and moves more easily on paper.

☞ This Pen is now in use in the large counting-houses and banks in this city.

A RARE GEM OF ART.

"The Lord's Prayer,"

A pen drawing, by Mr. D. F. Brown, is one of the most remarkable works of art ever exhibited in this country. By patient labor he has succeeded in producing a design which for skill and beauty of execution, exquisite softness and delicacy of finish, and general merit, it would seem scarcely possible to surpass. The central figure—the face of our savior—is one of marvelous power and beauty. This and the faces of the Twelve Apostles, forming the border of the piece, are faithful copies from Leonardo da Vinci's famous painting of the

LAST SUPPER,

Re-producing, with the softest and most perfect shadings, the conceptions and characteristic expressions of the originals. Within this enclosure the words of the Lord's Prayer, in ornamental letters of various original designs and exquisite finish, are an interesting study of art in themselves; while appropriately distributed among these, miniture groups and scenes of marked events of Savior's life, copied from the great masters—five of them from Raphel's celebrated designs—form a harmonious completion of this unique, beautiful and truly wonderful work. The faces of

OUR LORD AND HIS APOSTLES.

Alone, so finely copied, would be a treasure in any house, and worth the full price of subscription.

Local Sketches.

These sketches have been made for the benefit of strangers, credulous people and weak minded persons, by a man who has visited many of the places of which he writes, or has read concerning them in the papers. The wayfaring man, though a fool, can believe as much of them as he can endure:

Telegraph Hill.

Telegraph Hill is located at the upper end of Montgomery street. It can only be reached by going up. I never heard of a person who arrived at the summit of this peak by going down, in my life. The city does not seem to extend any further than the top of this hill; but it does. The reason it does not seem to extend any further is because you cannot see through the hill to that part of the city which lies on the other side.

This hill was settled about the same period as San Francisco. Although its inhabitants are not aristocratic, yet many of them deem themselves to be much above their neighbors. There are some Irish, some Dutch, some Scotch and some goats. There is an old, red house on the top on which every man who ever came to San Francisco has engraved his name with a common jack knife, so that the sides of that house look as if a thousand alphabets had rained down on them. The roof is surmounted, by what for many years was supposed to be a horizontal stove-pipe, so placed to keep from smoking, a contingency to which a stove-pipe on such an elevated position as the summit of a house on Telegraph Hill, might naturally be supposed to be exposed. This delusion continued for many years, until one day a brave and enterprising man from Oakland went close up to it and discovered it was a telescope through which one could get views of the harbor and city by paying a bit, and looking down the mouth of the instrument instead of peeping through one end as is done with any well regulated spy-glass.

Telegraph Hill is much infested by high winds and goats. Many of the goats have lately been suppressed owing to the energetic action of Captain Cook, the brave leader of the stray dog and hog rangers, but he cannot corral that wind.

The Station House.

This building is located opposite the Plaza, and was, at one time, greatly ridiculed, by being termed an ornament to the city. It is chiefly tenanted by law, lawyers, policemen, rogues and thieves Samuel Platt is there a good deal; so is Murphy, Zabriskie, and many other distinguished men, friends of the oppressed, who are nightly brought hither and confined in cold, dark, dump, dirty, dismal cages, by prowling and meddlesome policemen. The best way to find the Station House after dark, is to drink some of the worst whiskey you can get, (you won't have to hunt long for that,) and when you feel it begin to work, just lie down on the sidewalk, and you may, with tolerable certainty, rely on finding yourself inside of this judicial and reformatory institution by morning. I never, in my own case, knew this to fail. There is a levee held there every morning, except Sunday, by Judge Rix, and if you cannot get bail, you may be presented at Court. The Judge is quite reticent; in fact I never heard him on any of my presentations say anything but "Five dollars, or twenty-four hours;" or, "Thirty days in the County Jail." These remarks were, however, full of meaning, and were quite enough for the time.

Mr. Louderback lives, much of the time, at the Station House His voice is quite potential at Rix's court, and he generally manages to say a good deal, more than many care about hearing. The beds are poor, considering the charges often made against their occupants. The fare is plain. Boarders are always happy to leave.

The policemen live in the Station House. Their time is smoothly spent in lugging home drunks, and presenting each other with watches and gold-headed canes. Once, in a great while, they like to see their names in the papers. Policemen have died poor. Members of the Press live in the Station House. They subsist by lying about and collecting news for the papers. The Station House will always remain an ornament to our city, until honesty, sobriety, and all sorts of virtue are less talked about, and some faint attempt is made at practising them.

A Popular Saloon.

First a row of pictures, then a row of kegs, next a row of bottles, and finally on the floor, a row of old bunged up, worn baskets, kegs and bottles. In our much frequented saloons, why do they keep so much whiskey in so many bottles. I counted ninety-six bottles in active service at M—s', but I am forgetting. These remarks are not personal. We must not puff. We are forbidden to puff. There are seven sides to the saloon which I am now endeavoring not to puff. There is the oyster bar, (oysters breed on bars,) and above it a stuffed eagle. I would that I could do these people a service. They, always, on my entrance recommend spiritual refreshment, but I cannot, conditions being unfavorable, recommend them as I would.

On the other side you may behold, without charge, the dog memorable in the annals of San Francisco, the stuffed dog, his wings clipped forever on this miserable earth where one must pay for everything necessary for human comfort. He reposes on a pile of barrels.

There are some very nice pictures in this place—funny pictures. They also rest over old barrels and champagne baskets, looking as if the writer had been inspired by the contents of the vessels below him. The popularity of this particular saloon is owing to the fact that they never tried to improve its appearance too much—always let things lay around in a free and easy way; very suggestive of the idea of personal ease and comfort. Had I my advice to give a saloon keeper doing a good business in an old, dirty, mean place, I would say "Don't sweep away too many cobwebs," and if you would give the public an additional inducement to patronize you, always have an old hat and a broken bottle lying on the flood handy, to kick at.

Two newspaper men once did delight to bark and bite, and gouge and scratch out each others eyes, very near this saloon. Inigo—but I must refrain from personalities. The quarrel is historical, and is the particular property of the saloon in question.

They have a great many curiosities. There are Indian war-clubs, and jagged Indian spears, reminding one of the internal effect of bad whiskey. These last are put there by Mar— in order to warn his patrons against trusting too freely to the wiles of other saloon keepers

Mart—is an embodiment of sociability and good nature. On certain temperaments, he has the effect of a streak of sunshine on a hot stove, or a hot brick; in fact he is a brick anyway. He makes bricks. Thousands can testify to this: I can.

Sale of the Beideman Estate.

Platt's Hall was crowded with people on Wednesday last attending the sale of the Beideman Estate. Many ladies were present. This is an era of feminine land speculation. Everybody had a catalogue, which gave rather a literary appearance to these worshippess of Mammon. The exercises were commenced by a discussion between General Cobb and an invisible defender of the Moore Claim. Substance of the debate, thus Moore Claim: "I protest against this sale. Read my protest." Unknown man: "Heave him out the window!" General Cobb then commenced reading the protest. Moore Claim again raised his voice, but Cobb raised one better, telling him to "shut up," as his claim "was not worth a cent." Moore Claim naturally wished to know why his claim was worth so little, and Cobb produced J. B. Felton, who told everybody how he had proved the Moore Claim a fraud, and would defend all purchases made at the sale, until the cases were finally settled, without a dollar of cost. General Cobb, the Moore Claim having disappeared, made an eloquent and feeling little speech, in which he told us all that we were the biggest crowd ever got together at any one sale, save and except, the Broderick sale; that now was the accepted time. the day of salvation for all who would buy house lots, town lots and homesteads; that ten per cent. he must have on the fall of the hammer, that in this respect no leniency would be shown the Tycoon of Japan, the Emperor of China, John Conness, Gorham or any other human being, unless these people aforesaid plunked down their ten per cent.

The sale then commenced. As the first lot went up a claimant arose with it reading a protest. He had possession for twelve years and was going to keep it. It made no difference- The lot was knocked down for five thousand dollars.

An old woman made a disturbance about "173." Nobody knew what she meant by "173." whether it was her lot or her age, or a fire company she belonged to, in some place where fire companies were numerous. She muttered and she sputtered, and was disregarded. And so the "ball went on." The auctioneer bawled, the crowd stood on benches and tumbled off, people bought and went off, with hearts elate, and those who couldn't buy, looked on, and felt poor.

Singular.

Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, in the Flag of Friday morning, publishes a very beautiful poem entitled, "Whom First We Love." Singular as it may appear, the words and sentiment coincide exactly with one published some time since by one Robert Bulwer Lytton, (Owen Meredith.) These coincidences will sometimes happen.

A Necessity.

It is frequently necessary to read both sides of the Alta to approximate to an idea as to which side it is on, politically, and even then many of its readers are left in such a condition as not to know which side they are on themselves.

The Political Muddle.

With a sort of fearful, yet amusing gravity, the Bulletin persists in advising Georgy Gorham to resign. "If he yields" it says, "with a good grace, those who now dislike him, will admit that he has shown a spirit of self sacrifice, and he will rise in their estimation."

So fatherly; Georgy, be a good boy now and resign, and we'll think, O, ever so much of you.

"If he refuses to retire and fails in the contest, as he surely will, his colleagues on the ticket will blame him bitterly for his obstinacy, and attribute the catastrophe of their defeat to his selfishness." If Georgy is a bad boy and will try to be governor, his papa will be very much displeased with him, so he will.

And now whom does the Bulletin propose in Georgy's place? Bidwell seems to be rather uncertain regarding the acceptance of that nomination. In an editorial on his position we are told that, "as the Republicans never thought it necessary to have his consent, they are still determined to vote for him as they were before." By this, it would appear that Bidwell was to be rushed into the gubernatorial chair whether or no; were we not told in the very same article that, "should Gorham finally listen to reason and withdraw, the friends of General Bidwell, knowing his unselfishness, would not be unwilling to withdraw his name in favor of some acceptable citizen who has not been prominent in the dispute that divides the organization."

As near as we can get at the Bulletin's plan, Bidwell must be voted for anyhow. Gorham "must listen to reason and withdraw, then Bidwell must withdraw, and Lo Presto! out pops the "respectable citizen" who is now being set on by the old hen, (the Bulletin,) undergoing a sort of incubatory process, preparatory to hatching out at the proper time a full fledged gubernatorial chicken. No wonder the Bulletin clucks.

Sickness.

Several of the male and female editors of the CALIFONIAN, are sick. We take our beds in regular succession to-day, one lying down when the other gets up. Of course we haven't got many beds. The energies of this establishment are taxed to the utmost, but we shall survive. Editors may die, but the paper lasts. The individual members of a company may be annihilated, by a single discharge of musketry, yet the regiment still exists. Give us pens, ink, paper, type, and compositors, and we will get out a paper, though every vast intellect in the city be drained to the ledge in supplying us with matter, and the credit, and patience of every saloon in the neighborhood be exhausted.

P. S. The indomitable energy of the CALIFORNIAN, cannot be doubted, but the writer of this paragraph is not the writer of the foregoing, which partakes of a reckless and somewhat immoral spirit. We must finish what the previous writer has begun. We are the moral writer of the concern. We have just risen from our sick bed to give the immoral man a chance to go below, but we will never endorse the sentiments—.

Maximilian's Death.

As he had lived, so he died, a brave, honest, true sincere, simple man. In the manner he met his death was manifest his bravery. Giving himself into Corona's hands, stating that if they wanted a victim he was ready, is ample evidence of the truth and sincerity which actuated him in assuming the position he did with the Mexican people. Carrying out the Christian principle "in honor preferring each other" when set between Miramon and Mejica to be shot he yields his position to Miramon saying "A gallant man is respected by his sovereigns, allow me to yield to you the place of honor." Informed of Carlotta's death, he says, "Even in this has heaven favored me," evincing a love and devotion whose bounds set not in the horizon of earthly time. He might, in his political career have been erring in judgment, but the manner in which he met his fate shows that he had successfully passed the ordeal of that great judge and justifier, his own conscience.

Views Without Boots.

A young gentleman, who figures to an extent among the literary and pedantical circles of this city, advertises that he will shortly deliver a lecture, descriptive of the manner in which he went through Europe, barefooted, on $181 00, in greenbacks! Don't think it would have been remunerative to have kept a hotel on his route. The proceeds of the lecture will be devoted towards the publication of a novel by this young man, which if we are not mistaken, is to be entitled, "Eternity; or how I read 'em to Death." Success to the young man, who can so skilfully manipulate $181 00 in greenbacks.

Dreadful!

A lady of this city in charge of a certain educational institute has been threatened with the withdrawal of some of her pupils by their parents on account of her participating in a private theatrical performance. A spirit of this kind is eminently calculated to cause any one suffering from it to wish earnestly for their speedy withdrawal to the grave or any other place, hot or cold, where they may be spared from the persecution of such old fashioned bigotry.

KATIE KESTER'S LOVERS.

I.

In the cottage to the left hand of the forge at Harwood there lived, some forty years ago, a man of the name of Christopher,—or, as the country-folks abbreviated it, Kester—Patemen. He had formerly held the post of village blacksmith and farrier, but had long since retired from the exercises of his craft. He was said to have the gift of the evil eye; not that he was a malicious man, but that involuntarily his look blighted whatever it fixed upon. Friend or enemy, his own children or aliens, it was all one; Kester's eye settled on them, and they withered away. The crops on his little farm were either frosted, blighted, or miserably thin; or, if they were good and abundant, rain came after the corn was cut to injure it; once he got it all stacked and the stack took fire; another time the grain was threshed out and stored up in safety, but the rats devoured a third part of it. His cattle were the leanest in the country; his sheep died of disease; his children perished one by one as they grew up to manhood and womanhood; the very horses he shod, fell lame. Kester was a miserable man; all the country avoided him as if he had got the plague.

Kester had one child left, a daughter, born long after the rest; she being the offspring of a young Irish girl whom he had chosen to marry in his old age. The Irish girl ran away soon after the child's birth, on the plea of having a husband in her own country whom she liked better.

Kester made no attempt to bring her back, but contented himself with spoiling Katie. Katie was not a bit like what his other children had been; she was her mother over again. Two wide-opened dark blue eyes, a white skin, considerably freckled, black elf locks always in a tangle, a wide red mouth, and little teeth like pearls; a figure smart, and lissom, and a step that lilted along as if it kept time to an inward tune, made of Katie a village beauty and a coquette.

The strangest thing of all was (so the people thought at least) that Kester's evil eye had no effect on Katie. She grew as strongly and bloomed as hardily as the wild briar in the hedge-row. Everybody remembered the five children who were born to him by his first wife; how they pined from their cradle. They had a sickly hectic in their faces like their mother; while Katie's cheeks were red as a damask rose; they crept about home weary and ailing always, while Katie was away in the woods, nutting and bird-nesting like a boy. Kester could deny her nothing, and she grew up, to the wonder of the village, healthier, more wilful, and bonnier than any girl in the district.

II.

The blacksmith who had succeeded Kester Patemen at the village forge was a young man of herculean strength, and a wild character. He was more than suspected of a tenderness for the Squire's pheasants, but the gamekeeper had not yet been found bold enough to give him a night encounter in the woods; his name was Rob Mc'Lean; he had been a soldier, and was discharged with a good conduct pension, after ten years' service, and two wounds. He was Katie's first sweet heart. She was very proud to be seen walking with him in the green lane on Sunday nights; but it was more child's pride than anything else, for, when he began to talk about marrying, she laughed and said no, she was not for him, he was too old.

Jasper Linfoot, the miller's eldest son, next cast his eyes upon her, and followed her like her shadow for a month; but no—Katie did not fancy him, he was too ugly; he squinted, he had red hair, and his legs were not both of the same length. Then there was Peter Askew, the squire's huntsman, but he was a widower; and Phil Cressy, the gardener, but he was a gooso; and Tom Carter—but Katie could never abide a tailor.

While Katie, very hard to please, was coquetting with her would-be lovers, perfectly safe and perfectly heart-free, Kester Pateman had settled all the time whom she should marry—Johnny Martin, and nobody else. Johnny was the only son of Martin, the squire's coachman, who had saved money. He was a simple young man, with lank hair, a meek expression of countenance, and some gift for expounding, which he practised to small select congregations in Pateman's barn every Sunday evening. When Kester announced his intention to his daughter, Katie pouted her red lips and tossed her head, saying with an accent of superlative contempt, "That Johnny!" But she answered neither yea nor nay to her father's words; and the next Sunday "that Johnny" came courting with a little basket of cabbages on his arm, as an offering to his belle.

Katie looked as if it would have done her heart good to fling them one after the other in his fat foolish face, but she restrained the impulse, and only said:

"I'll plant 'em out to-morrow, Johnny."

"Plant them out, Katie? Why they're to eat."

"Pigs?" asked Katie in innocent bewilderment. "We don't keep any."

"No, they're for you, Katie; they're the finest white-hearts."

"Hearts! Oh, Johnny, take 'em away, directly; hearts!—I never saw a heart before," and she peeped into the basket with a face of horrified curiosity.

Now, Johnny had proclaimed that his affections had fallen on Katie because she was such a clever girl, and could do everything; but this exhibition of her talents by no means equalled his former impressions. He tried her again:

"Can't you cook, Katie? Did you never stuff and roast a heart for your father's dinner?"

"Oh, Johnny, and you putting up for the school-master's place; what wicked nonsense you are talking! Surely you've called at the Blue Cow by the way?"

Johnny at this monstrous insinuation broke out into a cold perspiration; he was the most abstemious of young men, and had a name in the village for every variety of excellence; and Katie was quite capable of telling her suspicions everywhere. He endeavored to take her hand and to put his arm round her waist; but Katie brought her palm against his cheek with such hearty good will that he was fain to subside upon his chair in meek dismay.

"If you do that again, Johnny Martin, I'll tell my father," she cried; and, with an affectation of great anger, she bowled his cabbages out into the garden, and ordered him to march after them in double quick time. He took up his hat and obeyed her, casting on her, as he went, the most pitiful and expostulatory glances.

"Don't stop at the Blue Cow, Johnny; go straight home," she cried as he went out at the gate, and the defeated swain crept away quite dejected.

Katie returned into the house, and began to sleek her hair before the little glass by the kitchen fire, humming a tune all the time, and thinking how well she was rid of Johnny, when that worthy's voice sounded through the open window:

"I didn't stop at the Blue Cow, Katie." She turned smartly round with such a shrewish face that Johnny added, in haste to deprecate her wrath, "I left my basket, Katie; let me get it—it's in the corner.'

"At your peril set foot over the door-stone, Johnny!" Johnny's plump countenance instantly disappeared. She snatched up the basket, threw it after him, and then took a hearty fit of laughter to herself.

III.

It was the beginning of the harvest: and, on the evening of the day after Johnny Martin's inauspicious courting visit, Kester Pateman and Katie were sitting on the wooden bench before the door, she knitting, and he bemoaning, when a party of Irish reapers, with their sickles in their hands, came up the lane. They stopped at the gate, and one of the men asked if Kester wanted hands for his corn?

"No, I see nae the use o' hands," replied the old man; "it'll all be spoilt."

It had been a splendid season, and Kester's little fields showed as rich and ripe a crop as any in the country; it was quite ready for cutting, and the weather was settled and favorable.

"But, father, you must have hands," said Katie, who had a most irreverent disbelief in the evil eye; "two reapers and a binder, with you and me, will get the crops in this week, and I'll overlook 'em for luck." Kester stopped two men and a lad, and bade the others go higher up the lane to Marshall's farm. "But where's the good of it, Katie?" he added. "You'd have had a tidy fortune but for me. Go into the barn, lads, you'll get your supper 'enow." The old man was very despondent; for he had just lost a fine calf, which he thought to sell at a good price. Katie bade him cheer up, and went indoors to set out the supper for the reapers. When it was ready, she called to them to come; three as Ragged Robins as ever might have served for scare-crows appeared at her bidding.

One of them was a tall fine young man, with a head well set on his shoulders, a roguish eye, and a very decided national tongue. He looked at Katie, and she at him; and, for the first time in her life, the girl's eyes fell, and her color rose. Alick seemed slightly bashful too,—very slightly—for, after dropping his glance on his plate for a second, it followed Katie to and fro in the kitchen without intermission, until she went out into the garden again. Alick could see her through the branches of briar across the window, standing at the gate with her father, talking to Rob McLean, and he immediately conceived an intense dislike for that well-built son of Vulcan, with the scar across his forehead. Alick jumped to conclusions very quickly; he had fallen in love at first sight, and was ready to quarrel with any man who so much as looked at Katie.

Having made an end of his supper, he went out into the lane to his comrades, who were sitting under the hedge resting and munching lumps of bread and cheese,—Marshall's kitchen not being big enough to hold them all. Alick kept Katie at the gate in sight; and, though she seemed never to look his way, she knew perfectly well how he watched her; and moved perhaps, by the natural spirit of coquetry, she marched with her knitting into the house, and shut herself up in her bedroom. It had a window looking on the lane, and Katie sat near it with her pins and stocking, peeping out sometimes to see how the evening went on, and whether there was promise of fine weather next day to cut the corn. Alick wandered off by-and-by. How should he know that tiny lattice in the bushy pear-tree was Katie's?

IV.

Alick, Kester, Katie, and the rest, were all in the fields next morning as soon as the sun was up. The reaping began. Katie would bind for Alick; and, during the day, the two exchanged a good many sharp words. Rob M'Lean came to lend a hand in the afternoon, and the men soon found each other out: but Rob had a decided advantage over the other. "Was there ever such a wild Irishman, all tatters and rags, ever seen in the country-side before?" whispered Rod to Katie, as they sat under a tree, at four o'clock, eating the 'lowance that had been brought from the house; Katie gave Alick a sly glance, and said "No." And, as Alick overheard both question and answer, he vowed vengeance against Rob.

That night in the lane there was Jasper Linfoot and Phil Cressy; and Katie talked and laughed with both of them; and the next day she was gossiping with Peter Askew over the field-tyle; and in the evening Tom Carter brought her some shreds of scarlet cloth that she wanted to weave into a mat, and Katie chattered with him; and the next day Johnny Martin came with an offering of summer apples, which (Alick being there to see) were graciously accepted. So Johnny was heartened into staying half-an-hour, sighing and smiling spasmodically. Alick went out very wrathful. "So many rivals are too many for one man," thought he. And, all the following morning, he took no more notice of Katie than he did of Kester—I mean, he seemed not to take notice of her.

Katie was as cross as sticks, and pretended she was ill, and must go home. Home, accordingly, she went, and tangled her knitting horribly. She had not been there long, when Alick came in at the gate with a long face, holding his hand in a handkerchief all stained with blood. Up sprang Katie, the color going out of her face with fright.

"You're hurt, Alick! O how have you done it? Let me see and bind it up."

"The least bit in creation, Miss Katie; but you're the best binder in the world, and it'll heal under your eyes," replied the wily Alick, uncovering the injured hand.

Katie got a sponge and water, and bathed it, and her pity fled.

"It's not much more than a scratch," said she; so Alick groaned miserably.

"Surely, Miss Katie, it's the hard heart you've got, for all your bonnie face," said he, reproachfully.

Katie blushed. Nobody else's compliments had ever had that pleasing effect before; and Alick suddenly took heart of grace, and said one or two more pretty things that did not seem to vex Katie very much. The dressing of the wound being done, Alick was obliged to go back to the field; carrying the 'lowance was an excuse for Katie to go too; so leaving her ball to the mercy of the cat on the floor, she got the basket and stone bottle of beer ready, and followed Alick. The reapers said 'lowance was early that day, and her father found fault about it.

Alick's reflections were of a more cheerful turn now. "Too many rivals may be as good as none," he thought. Indeed, he had found out—who knows by what freemasonry?—that Katie liked nobody so well as him; and he turned his discovery to good account. Did she encourage Rob, or Jasper, or Peter, or Johnny, or any one of her many admirers, by word or smile, he devoted himself to Jennie, the pretty Irish girl, who was binding at Marshall's farm; and Katie's pillow could have testified that he had ample revenge.

Thus they went on till the last shock was in stack, and the Irish reapers began to travel north in search of fresh pastures. All went but Alick; and he, from his quick wit and sharp eye, had won favor with the Squire's head keeper, who retained him as one of his watchers.

Although he had arrived at Harwood a scarecrow of rags, who so trim and spruce now as Alick? Katie had a secret pride in his appearance, as, with his gun on his arm and his game-bag slung over his shoulder, he followed the Squire in the woods,—looking, as she thought, far the finer and handsomer gentleman. That Johnny's face had now become perfectly sickening to her, and none the less so because Kester would talk of their marriage; for the young man had been chosen village schoolmaster, with a salary of thirty pounds, a cottage and garden rent-free, and coals ad libitum; so that he had a home to take her to.

Katie was having a good cry one afternoon in the house by herself, over the thoughts of Johnny, when there came a knock to the door. She got up and opened it, expecting to see a neighbor come in for a gossip; but, instead, there stood Alick.

Directly he saw what she had been about, he cried, "Who has been vexing thee, Katie? Only tell me,—tell me, Katie!" And a smile broke through her tears as she said, "O Alick, it's that Johnny!" And they looked in each other's faces and laughed.

What Alick said more, this tradition betrayeth not; but, whatever it was, Johnny's prospects of a wife were not increased thereby; and when Alick went away home to his cottage at the park gate, it was with triumphant step and his curly head in the air; and Katie cried no more over her knitting that afternoon.

V.

Village gossip soon proclaimed that fact of Alick's visits to to Kester Pateman's cottage; and amongst the first to hear of them was Johnny. He went and remonstrated with Katie, and threatened to tell her father. Katie's blood was up, and she dared him to tell at once. So Johnny did tell, and Kester bade Alick keep away. "Katie's for no Irish beggar, but for a decent Harwood lad," said he, surlily. "And you'll come about my place no more, Sir Gamekeeper,—d'ye hear."

Alick feigned obedience; but he and Katie met in the green lane on Sundays. There was a little gate from the pasture where Kester's cows were, into the wood; and often, at milking time, you might have seen Alick leaning over the gate, talking to Katie at her task; but, as the evenings grew cold and the cattle were brought up to the house, these meetings were less frequent; for Kester began to watch his daughter as a cat watches a mouse. He suspected her.

The neighbours noticed Katie become graver and paler, and shook their heads portentously. "She's fading like the rest of them," they said; "she'll not see the spring. Kester's smitten her, poor man!"

And, by-and-by, Kester saw the change himself. When he did see it, his heart stopped beating. "Why, Katie, my bairn!" cried he, with fully awakened love and fear; "Kate, my bairn! Thou's not going off in a waste, like thy brothers and sisters?"

Katie was knitting by the firelight; and, as her needless went, her tears fell. "I don't know, father; but the neighbors say I look like it. I'm sick and ill——" and her tears flowed faster.

Kester kissed her, and went out in a black mood.

"Oh, what'll I do? What'll I do for thee, Katie, my bairn?" said he, aloud. "I'm fit to tear my eyes out o' my head! What have I done, that all goes ill with me?"

It happened that Alick was loitering about in the hope of a chance word with Katie, and he overheard Kester's lamentation.

"What's the matter, Master Pateman? Katie's not ill, is she?" he ventured to ask. Glad to unfold his misery to anybody, Kester told Alick of his daughter's changed looks, and what everybody attributed them to.

"Go to the wise man, 'Bram Rex, at Swinford, to-morrow; he's got a charm agen the Evil Eye," suggested Alick, in haste. "He'll tell you what to do; you may trust him."

Somewhat comforted, Kester re-entered the house. Alack went off to Swinford to prepare the sage for his visitor the next day.

VI.

After breakfast, on the following morning, Kester mounted his old grey mare, and went slowly to Swinford, very mournful, and much troubled in his mind. The village of Swinford was, by the river, seven miles from Harwood, and the high road ran along the bank with a steep fall to the water, which was covered with hazel and low shrub. "Wherefore shouldn't I fling myself in there, and save the poor bairn?" he said to himself, as he saw the river shinning and glancing through the bushes. "But, after all," he added, "it will be as well to see old 'Bram Rex first, and hear what he's got to say about her. My poor bairn! Poor Katie!"

So he went forward to a small slated cottage at the entrance of the village, and knocked at the door.

"Come in," said a rough voice. Kester fastened his bridle to the paling of the garden, and entered.

The wise man was sitting in a large chair by the fireside, stirring a composition in a pan which had far more of the perfume of a poached hare than hell-broth, which the gossips said he was in the habit of making. 'Bram was an old man with a long beard, and the subtlest and most wily of smiles. He looked up at his visitor from under his brows cunningly and shrewdly, then motioned him to be seated by a wave of his hand.

"I know your errand, Kester Pateman," said 'Bram, solemnly. "I have been working out the horoscope all night. It is a case of difficulty."

Kester was profoundly impressed by this prescience, and his poor old hands shook as he drew out his leathern purse, and said:

"'Bram, it's not money or corn this time, it's my bairn Katie."

The sage nodded and echoed, "Katie! I knew it."

"What must I give you? This?

And Kester took out a gold piece, and laid it on the seemingly unconscious palm of 'Bram.

"Enough, Kester Pateman," replied he; "enough. Tell me what you want—your daughter is smitten——"

"Yes, 'Bram; but there was one told me you had a charm agen the Evil Eye. Would it save her? Will you sell it?" asked Kester, trembling all over with anxiety, and stretching out his feeble hands with the purse to 'Bram.

'Bram took the purse, but said severely:

"I do not sell, Kester Pateman—talk not of selling. Describe to me your child's symptoms, and be at peace."

The wise man had a voice of such preternatural depth that it really seemed as if his words were also of superior sagacity; Kester listened to him with the profoundest fatih, and then gave a description of Katie's state—her pale cheeks, her stillness, and her crying. 'Bram shook his head.

"I don't say she'll die, Kester, and I can't say she'll live; but there's one chance, if you'll try it."

"I'll do anything, 'Bram—why I'd die for that bairn! You don't know how I love my Katie. What's the chance 'Bram?"

"The stars will not be hurried, Kester Pateman; they have not spoken yet. Come and see."

The sage led the way into a second room, in the middle of which was a table whereon lay a sheet of paper with sundry figures and scrawls thereon.

"Look here," and 'Bram began to trace a line with his forefinger. "This is the girl's line of life. Mark it well, Kester Pateman."

Kester, dizzy with anxiety, fixed his eyes on it intently.

"Here is a man of battles; it passes him. This part shows them that seek her in matrimony; them that she must not marry, Kester—you mark me?"

Kester nodded his head.

"She must not marry any one of these with a cross agen 'em. Not this with the spade, nor the figure with a sack, nor him with the tailor's goose, nor yet this man leading of a horse, nor yet that one with the peaked cap and ferrule—the stars have spoken agen 'em all."

Kester said he saw that clearly enough.

"Mark me agen, Kester," pursued the sage, sinking his voice until it sounded as if it came up out of the toes of his boots; "mark well, for I can't show you it the second time. This is the sign of a powerful man who has come over the sea—he's got a sickle and a gun. The sickle means that he shall reap abudance o' corn, and live on the fat o' the land all his days, and the gun is a token that he's a brave man; and his face being to Katie's line o' life is a sign that he loves her, and that she has a thought for him. Are you hearkening, Kester?"

"Yes, 'Bram, I hear. Oh! but you are a knowledgeable man. These," following the first marks with his finger, "are surely Rob M'clean, and Jasper Linfoot, and here's Phil Cressy, and Peter Askew, and Tom Carter and Johnny Martin——"

"Them's their names! None o' em must your Katie marry, the stars has otherwise bespoke for 'em. Do you know who this last is, Kester?"

"It maun be Alick, the young Irish reaper; him that's at the Squire's now."

"Him it is, and no other! The interpretation thereof is just!" said 'Bram, emphatically, and rolled up a sheet of paper.

Kester Pateman was greatly in awe of 'Bram, but he endeavored to protest against the conclusion.

"'Bram, couldn't you bring forward another?" said he, hesitatingly.

"Can I alter the stars, Kester?" replied the sage in his sternest tone; I do not make, or mend, or mar, I only read for the blind what is written. You must give your bairn to Alick, or she'll die."

O! I will—surely I will, 'Bram!" in great haste cried poor Kester. "He's honest if he's poor, and Katie'll not have a penny. Tell me, 'Bram, will I sell my corn well this time!"

"You shall," responded 'Bram; "you shall sell it as others do."

"Have you that charm agen the Evil Eye that one told me of, 'Bram?" Kester humbly inquired.

"Yes, Kester; but it is not to be bought with silver nor gold. Send me half a bushel of your best oats, and you shall have it. I've parted with a many, but I've only one on hand now, and it's a good one."

"Let me have it 'Bram. You'll get the oats to-morn."

'Bram went to a drawer in the dresser, and, after rummaging for some minutes amongst the contents he brought forth a hare's foot with a string attached to it. He smoothed it carefully with his hand, muttering a formula of words as he did so.

"You must put this in your pillow, Kester, and every morning, the first thing when you get up, open the window, and fix on some particular tree or bush, and look at it steady while you spell your own name backwards three times. You must look every day fasting at the same thing, and in time it will wither away and die. And so you'll be cured, and in smiting the tree the rest o' your things'll be safe."

Kester took the hare's foot as tenderly as if it had been a sacred relic, and put it in his bosom.

"Thank you, 'Bram—and you're sure Katie'll be well if I let her wed Alick?"

"Yes, man! You'll find the lass's face shining when you get home, for she's feeling that your heart's changed towards her already. The stars has been whispering of it to her."

Quite cheerfully Kester trotted the grey mare home, and, as if immediately to prove the sage's words true, Kate came to meet him at the gate as rosy as a peony. Alick, at that minute, was escaping by the cow-house door into the pasture, after telling Katie of his visit to 'Bram Rex, and preparing her for its probable results.

VII.

In the centre of the great meadow directly opposite Kester Pateman's chamber window, there was a fine old oak tree, quite in the maturity of its years and strength. Under its wide-spreading branches a herd of cattle could shelter from the summer heat, and in its giant bole was timber enough to build a frigate almost. When Kester rose the morning after his visit to 'Bram Rex, he opened his window, and his eyes fell on this tree the first thing, as they had probably done for many a year. This time he gazed at it fixedly, half expecting to see the leaves and branches shrivel under his gaze; but he spelt his name backwards three times, and there were no visible effects. He went to market after breakfast and sold his corn, and bought a new cow; so implicit was his faith in 'Bram's charm; and, meeting Johnny Martin, told him ruefully, that he must leave off thinking of Katie; for she was not permitted to be his wife.

In about a month after Kester Pateman's visit to 'Bram Rex, there was a wedding at Harwood, and such a dance in Kester's barn as had never been heard of in the country-side before. All the defeated swains were there. Johnny Martin and Tom Carter made the music on two independent-minded violins, and lost, in this opportunity of distinguishing themselves, the sore sensation of disappointment. Johnny behaved nobly; he presented Katie with half a peck of apples as a wedding present, and looked glorious all night. When Katie came near him once, he whispered:

"Katie, did you tell anybody about the Blue Cow?"

"No, man; it was only my fun," replied she, mischievously; and Johnny drew a long breath of relief.

What a dance that was to the tune of Merrily danced the Quaker's wife and merrily danced the Quaker! It seemed as if it would never come to an end. So loud and hilarous was the mirth that nobody heard the thunder rattling overhead, or saw the lightning leaping about the hills. But there had been certainly a terrible storm that night, though few people at Harwood recollect it; and the next morning, when Kester opened his window, as his custom was, to give the charmed gaze at the oak trees in the meadow, behold! one side was reft entirely of its boughs, and a black scarred trunk faced him instead of yesterday's majestic growth. Kester stared back affrighted. Could this be the effect of his Evil Eye.

If you ever go to Harwood, as you ride into the village, in the meadow opposite the blacksmith's forge you will see the blasted trunk of the giant oak tree; and should curiosity prompt you to ask how it came to be destroyed, any gossip will tell you that one Kester Pateman withered it away by the power of the Evil Eye—he having gazed at it every morning, fasting, for that purpose. They will tell you also that, from having been one of the most unlucky of men, he became one of the most prosperous in the district, with grandchildren and great-grandchildren, and flocks and herds innumerable.

Alick and Kate live in the farm-house down by the water-pasture, which the Squire let them have when they were married. By dint of talking of it, they have come themselves to believe in the Evil Eye. 'Bram Rex's descendants live and flourish in various districts; though 'Bram himself, for some mistake respecting another person's property, was transported to a distant colony to exercise his craft there—with what success, this tradition sayeth not.

A Unique Ball.—A very unique and pleasant ball was given the other evening, in Paris, by Madame O'Connell, a well-known artist. The scene was a vast studio, with acres of window, with the indispensable green baize sunshades, and rich folds of old tapestry; paintings and studies lined the walls, and, from shelves and brackets over the pictures, and far up into the gloom of the lofty ceiling, gleamed statues, busts and antique torsos; gigantic stuffed birds spread their dusty wings over carved oak cabinets, crowded with curiosities of all kinds, lay figures, skulls, statucttes, and china jars. Below in the half light, diamonds and satins glittered and shone, and waltzers passed swiftly over the polished floor. The beautiful hostess, about a month ago, appeared at a ball dressed as an Egyptian priestess. Long white robes in heavy folds, a mass of ornaments on her breast, a golden serpent wound around her white headdress, its head raised above her brow, and, in her hand, a long staff crowned with the sacred bird. Madame O'Connell gives a grand costume ball every year, a soiree pique nique, that is to say, formed on the picnic principle, an ingenious method adopted by some artists who have not King Midas' magic fingers, but plenty of friends and splendid dancing room. Each guest contributes to the supper, the ladies sending plats and the gentlemen wine. A well garnished buffet is thus insured, and its origin saved from ridicule by the all powerful laws of Bohemia.

LITERARY GLEANINGS.

DORA GREENWELL'S POEMS.

WE do not know whether "Dora Greenwell" is a real name or a nom de plume, though we suspect the latter. What we do know however, that she is well worthy of an honored place among that group of pure and noble singers, of whom Jean Ingelow, Elizabeth Barrett Browning, Adelaide Proctor, and Miss Rosetti are the chief. Superior as Tennyson or Browning, or Swinburne may be to these women-poets, some of them in grasp of intellect, others in complete and perfect art, or the grand classic forms in which they embody their thoughts and fancies, no man since Wordsworth has rivalled this glorious sisterhood of song in the mingled sweetness, purity, and strength, with which the loftier aspects of the religious sentiment are presented, with the sole exception perhaps, of Tennyson, in certain portions of In Memoriam. The title page of the volume bears the appropriate device of a hand grasping a cross, with the legend, Et teneo, et teneor—appropriate, because never did poetry breathe a truer spirit of the religion of the Cross, than that of this little book. Without detaining our readers by further commment, we make room for a few specimens. The following reminds us of Adelaide Proctor's piece, entitled either "The Letter," or "Too Late" which, we are not positive:

THE KISS.

"She died young!"

"I think not so; her infelicity Seemed to have years too many."
—WEBSTER.

I come to thee from one
Thou knowest of, I bear to thee her kiss:
"No bitter words," she said, "when I am gone Give thou, but only this."

The mouth was well-nigh cold
I took it from, yet hath it power to bless:
The lips that sent it never moved of old
Except in tenderness;

And ere they ceased to stir
They trembled, as if then they strove to frame
A word—the only one 'twixt heaven and her—
Methought it was thy name.

They wore unto the last
A calm, sad, twilight smile, from patience won;
Her face had light on it that was not cast
From joy's long-sunken sun.

She waited for a word
Of Love to stay on; Hope did long endure;
She waited long on Time, for she had heard
His spells, though slow, were sure.

She waited; but her stroke
Was heavier than her groaning; one by one
All failed her; Grief was strongest, so it broke
Each thing it leaned upon.

She waited long on God,
And he forsook not; through the gloomy vale
She leant upon His staff until His rod
Brake forth in blossoms pale.

Then did her spirit bless
The gracious token; then she saw the rife
Salt-crusted standing pools of bitterness
Spring up to wells of life.

And Peace, a friend for years
Estranged, stood by her on her dying bed:
See that thou weep not o'er her grave, her tears
Have long ago been shed.

She grieves not for the mould:
A heavier load lay long upon her breast
Than Earth, which hath been to her far more cold
In waking than in rest!

The next piece is in the same solemn vein—but it is a solemnity free from any touch of morbidness:

GONE.

Alone, at midnight as he knelt, his spirit was aware
Of somewhat falling in between the silence and the prayer,

A bell's dull clangour that hath sped so far, it faints and dies
So soon as it hath reached the ear whereto its errand lies;

And as he rose up from his knees, his spirit was aware
Of Somewhat, forceful and unseen, that sought to hold him there;

As of a Form that stood behind, and on his shoulders prest
Both hands to stay his rising up, and Somewhat in his breast,

In accents clearer far than words, spoke, "Pray yet longer, pray,
For one that ever prayed for thee, this night hath passed away;

"A soul, that climbing honr by honrthe silver-shining stair
That leads to God's great treasure-house, grew covetous and there

"Was stored no blessing and no boon, for thee she did not claim,
(So lowly, yet importunate!) and ever with thy name

"She linked—that none in earth or heaven might hinder it or stay—
One Other Name, so strong, that thine hath never missed its way.

"This very night within my arms this gracious soul I bore
Within the Gate, where many a prayer of hers had gone before;

"And where she resteth, evermore one constant song they raise:
Of 'Holy, holy,' so that now I know not if she prays;

"But for the voice of Praise in Heaven, a voice of Prayer hath gone
From Earth; thy name upriseth now no more; pray on, pray on!"

Here is an exquiste little cabinet picture—though a trifle. It is entitled,

HOME.

Two birds within one nest;
Two hearts within one breast,
Two spirits in one fair
Firm league of love and prayer,
Together bound for aye, together blest.

An ear that waits to catch
A hand upon the latch;
A step that hastens its sweet rest to win,
A world of care without,
A world of strife shut out,
A world of love shut in.

The next is a companion piece, with more of summer tints in the coloring:

THE BRIDGE.

NOON.

We lingered on the rustic bridge,
We saw the pebbles in the stream
Below us, clear in amber light
Of noonday, flash and gleam;
Afar, the yellow flag-flower caught
A glory from the flitting beam,
And all was still and fair, methought,
And golden as a dream.

Oh, might this hour not pass away!
Oh, were it given to us, not lent!
And might we, framed within it, stay,
And hear the babbling waters run,
And hear the distant stock-dove coo,
And dream that in the world were none
But only I and you!

The Sonnets, are in a deeper and more thoughtful vein. Those entitled "Ascending," "To Elizabeth Barrett Browning," "Reserve," "The Soul's Wooers," may rank among the best of this difficult species of poetical composition. In the piece "To The Nineteenth Century," and "A Song Which None But the Redeemed Can Sing," the author reveals a force and strength of pinion, for which none of the pieces quoted furnished any preparation. Of altogether a different character, but capital in its peculiar way, is the quiet, womanly satire on the cynicism of the most critical of London literary weeklies. We have space for only a short extract:

THE SATURDAY REVIEW.

"Learn to live and live and learn,"
In the days when I used to go to school,
Would always pass for an excellent rule;
But now it's grown a serious concern
The number of things I've had to unlearn
Since first I began the page to turn
Of The Saturday Review.
For once (I believe) I believed in truth
And love, and the hundred foolish things
One sees in one's dreams and believes in one's youth—
In Angels with curls, and in Angels with wings,
In Saints, and Heroes, and Shepherds too;
The pictures that David and Virgil drew
So sweetly, I thought were taken
From very life, but now I find
A Shepherd is but an uncouth Hind,
Songless, soulless, from time out of mind,
Who has cared for nothing but bacon.

And I sometimes think, if this same Review,
And the world a little longer too
Should last, will the violets come out blue?
Will the rose be red, and will lovers woo
In the foolish way that they used to do?
Will doves in the summer woodlands coo,
And the nightingales mourn without asking leave?
Will the lark have an instinct left to cleave
The sunny air with her song and her wing?
Perhaps we may move to abolish spring;
And now that we've grown so hard to please,
We may think that we're bored by the grass and the trees;
The moon may be proved a piece of cheese,
Or an operatic delusion.
Fathers and Mothers may have to go,
Brothers and Sisters be voted slow,
Christmas a tax that one's forced to pay,
And Heaven itself but an out-of-the way
Old-fashioned place that has had its day,
That one wouldn't a residence choose in.

And though so easily learnt and brief
Is the form our new faith's put in,
When we've said, "I believe in a Round of Beef,
And live by a Leg of Mutton,"
We come to another region of facts,
That are met quite as well by the Gospel and Acts
As by any teaching that's newer—
Life has its problems hard to clear,
And its knots too stiff to be cut by the sneer
Of the sharpest, smartest Reviewer.

The book can be obtained at Roman's, and we must cordially commend it to all who are capable of appreciating and loving that kind of poetry that wells from the innermost depth of a pure and meditative spirit, and that reveals the noblest sentiments and emotions of a womanly nature, ripened by experience, refined by culture, chastened, but not saddened by suffering, and purified by religion.

A MODEL GUNSMITH STORE.—At the auction sale of Knickerbocker, No. 5's, house, on Sacramento street, just below Leidesdroff, Mr. A. J. Plate, the old established gunsmith, purchased the property. Knickerbocker's house was always noted for the taste and finish of its interior decorations, and Mr. Plate has made most excellent use of these in fitting up the lower floor as a store, previous to removing his gun rifle and pistol warehouse there during the present week. The upper stores serve as warerooms for the shot, lead, gun-trimmings, surplus stock, etc.; while the first floor is used solely as a store, sales and display room. We will venture to say that there is not a neater or better fitted up gun store in the United States.

NEW STYLE OF AMALGAMATING PANS.—Messrs. Devoe, Dinsmore & Co., of the San Francisco Foundry and Machine works, have just finished some new and improved Amalgamating Pans for Mr. D. T. Hughes, of Jeffersonville, in this State, that are pronounced very superior both in working and workmanship. The same firm is constructing some heavy hoisting gear machinery for the Nahuila mines, Mexico, that combines simplicity and freedom from friction with great power. They have also in hand several other contracts for mill and machine work, requiring proficiency in workmanship. Our foundries, though not over crowded with work, are still kept busy.

THEATRE SQUARE.—On this square stands the Metropolitan Theatre, and the Opera House; and on each of the Washington street corners of this square the Cigar stores of the two brothers, Mess. C. & H. Schmidt, where there can be found the choicest brands of Tobacco and Cigars. After leaving the Theatres, a good flavored cigar or chew of old Virginia tobacco assists the digestion of the play, with those who use the weed, and aids sleep in transplanting you into the land of pleasant dreams. Call and try their brands of the best imported Havana Cigars, and old Virginia Tobacco.

THE COUNTRY LANDLORD'S TRIALS.

BY DOGBERRY.

I AM often amused at the incredulity with which many of my friends receive the assertion, that once I "kept a hotel." They imagine that a scribbler has no right, or at least no business ever to have done anything practical.

But I did once keep a hotel—a country hotel, and I can prove it by the mention of facts and phases of that business, which no "honest landlord" can read without acknowledging that the person cognizant of these tavern truths must at least possess some of the knowledge requisite to "keep a hotel."

Keeping a country hotel, requires great versatility and a knack of turning one's hands to everything. City landlords have regular and stated duties. They can "play gentleman." Country landlords must play the gentleman too, but if my experience be any criterion, they must in busy periods, be up at four o'clock in the morning and help black boots, mix matutinal drinks for early risers, run to the market for steaks, lend the cook a helping hand, the hostler ditto, supply temporarily the place of some stupid errand boy to carry an irritable guest his hot water for shaving, make out bills and possibly run for a moment into the parlor and play a few airs on the piano or any inferior instrument suited to your musical capacity.

After doing your best for the accommodation of your brother man and sister woman, you must learn to endure any amount of grumbling with calmness and complacency. Very many people grumble because they love it. The experienced landlord knows this. He knows there are professional grumblers who can find no other field for the exercise of their vocation than by traveling from one hotel to another, grumbling at the landlord, the fare, the beds, the servants, and winding up in a prolonged howl of a grumble at the charges. Such people often transport bugs on their baggage and then accuse your beds of bugginess.

It is a herculean task at best. to keep a hotel free from these companions of humanity. Because they travel extensively. They travel in trunks, in carpet bags. aye, and on ladies dresses. I know. I call on my brother landlords to verify the truth of this statement. It is rather a plain, possibly an unpleasant fact, but it is wofully true.

Our hotel was located at a watering place on Long Island; at least it was termed a watering place, I hardly know why, for most of our guests only made use of the article to dilute a stronger beverage. During the three summer months, we were well patronized. We entertained two tribes of guests, people from New York city and New Englanders. The two classes are distinct. I could tell them at a glance. The New Yorker is liberal, dashing, generous, does not object to charges provided they are reasonble and makes pleasant company. Landlords, providing they are human, like to have agreeable, chatty guests.

But the New Englanders, particularly those from the banks of the Connecticut, seemed to regard a landlord as a legalized robber. They came in immense shoals on fishing parties. These constituted their single pleasure excursions for the year, and, poor people, they knew not how to enjoy themselves, and were disposed to attribute the failure of their anticipations of pleasure to the hotel-keeper. The men wore black suits creased, you know, from long folding, and the style of the women and children's dresses conveyed a general impression of their sleeping on straw. They bargained for a night's entertainment for themselves and families. They always haggled at the regular charges. They were frightened at mention of the rates per day. For their money, they expected in return the feasts of Belshazzar. And yet I knew how often these people at their homes lived on pork and cabbage. Understand, they were from the rural districts; those visiting us from the larger towns and cities seemed to be aware that a hotel was not a charitable institution for feeding and resting humanity. I do not wish to bring the wrath of all New England down on my head, but they know the sort of people I mean as well as I do. They are people who are obliged to pinch and grip in every direction on their rocky, sterile farms, to get a living. Nature has forced them to be close and stingy. They are not to blame. Put one on a Western or Southwestern prairie and in a few years he will become almost liberal—at times.

We experienced a great deal of colored help. We drew our supplies from a colored settlement, called Snooksville, a little out of town. Strangely enough it derived its name from Mr. Snooks, the only white settler there, a sort of Caucasian glimmer in a night of Ethiopic darkness. They had their churches and their sewing societies, and various other institutions, all strictly copied from those of their white brethren. It mattered not who we employed from Snooksville, there seemed to be a tie of consanguinity between such and the whole settlement. There was ever a succession of visits from a file of uncles, aunts, brothers, and cousins, and they always brought covered baskets and took them away again. I am certain we fed much of its population. The colored race are as much inclined to take things in an unlawful manner as any people I know of. Still one could not help liking them. They were all very pious—openly and loudly pious. But most of them must be kept closely converted or they are very apt to fall from grace on dark nights where chicken coops and well stocked larders abound.

Your help is most liable to desert you in the hour of need, when there is the greatest press of company. You pay them for being their slaves. In many cases the more valuable their services, the greater your servitude. In this way we served a colored steward for a whole year.. He ruled the house. Mrs. D. had infinitely more respect and reverence for that man than for me. If she desired to make any alteration in his department, she took as much care in broaching the subject to him as she would in announcing the death of some near relative.

Railroad and steamboat people, stage drivers, ministers, and newspaper correspondents form a portion of the landlord's trials. The railroad, steamboat and stage men expect bed, table and bar accommodations for nothing, or next to that unremunerative figure, and if this is not granted they threaten to divert patronage from your establishment. Ministers expect to be entertained at half price. If this is refused they go off with long faces and, perhaps, preach against you. Many newspaper correspondents can, conditions being favorable, stand a long time on the outside of your bar, and would even allow you to pay them for patronizing your house.

Your fellow townsmen have the most exaggerated ideas of the little patronage they afford you. Let an individual once be instrumental in throwing into your hands a Fourth of July dinner, or the getting up of a ball supper from which you barely make expenses and he never forgets the debt of gratitude you owe him.

A peculiar species of guest is the Yankee peddler, traveling the length and breadth of the country with buttons, knives, thread, silks, laces, segars, brooms, tin-ware, etc. "Notions," after all is the only word. He shaves his bill down to the first cost of everything, probably a little below it, and then wants you "to take it eout in trade." I don't know why these people are allowed to devour landlords with impunity. They are good company, however, having an inexhaustible fund of stories with which to regale the frequonters of the bar room, who are more numerous during their stay than at other times. P. T. Barnum's book was simply a collection of Yankee peddler's stories. Some among them could, in these times, flourish as humorous lecturers.

The landlord has to experience cross, fretful, miserable women who do not know what ails them, what they were created for, whose palates are suited with nothing, who employ the whole available force of the house and as many more as can be temporarily impressed in waiting on them, who want just the particular article of food out of time, place and season, and who reduce the cooks to the verge of distraction in their endeavors to create flavors existing only in imagination. Sometimes such parties bring their cooks with them and then there is war in the lower regions, for wherein would the superiority of these metropolitan and foreign cooks be apparent unless they found fault?

Servants and children are also a trial. The former never take kindly to the second table, and the latter take up the disfiguring of the walls, the spilling of gravy, the peeping into private rooms, the bawling, shouting and romping in the halls, the torment of the landlord, the especial torment of the landlady, and the general torment of all the other guests just where they left off at the last hotel stopped at.

Circus and theatrical people are not pleasant guests. They, too, imagine that by law they are entitled to board at a rate which leaves a mere ghost of profit. The gentlemen attached to a circus having personal charge of the equestrian department will take all from your stables they can carry off, and, indeed, you are fortunate if the stable be left behind. I appeal to the whole universe of Bonifaces if this is not so.

This is a mere skimming over of the country landlord's trials. But I defy anyone of the fraternity to read these results of my experience and then say with sincerity that I have not had, at least, one foot in this business of public servitude. It is enough to make one think he "can keep a hotel," and I think I can.

Italian Opera.—Il Trovatore, as given on Friday evening, of last week, was unquestionably the best performance of the season, all the artists being in good voice, to the great surprise of those who knew how those voices had been taxed. Lucrezia Borgia, on Saturday evening, was done almost as well; Ione, with remarkable perfection, on Monday; and Norma, in excellent style, on Wednesday, the audience being, on each occasion, heartily appreciative and very select. Lucia di Lammermoor drew a crowded house on Thursday evening, for Signorina Brambilla's benefit, which was a well merited tribute to her artistic excellence and faithful services. The opera was rendered with great spirit, and the most enthusiastic applause, and showers of boquets, testified the gratification of the audience. Poliuto was produced last night. This afternoon, at 2 o'clock, Ione will be given, at reduced prices of admission. There will be no performance this evening. The ninth subscription night will be given on Monday.

TO A PASSENGER.

A BON VOYAGE, whatever end
You trim your prosperous sails to reach;
And may the memory of your friend,
Out-live the weakness of his speech.

Men spent their lives, in days of old,
To find what I have lost to-day;
They tried to make the coarser gold:
You take the finer art away.

You've found the hidden way of good—
Occultest of occultest arts;
The alchemy of womanhood;
The alkahest that solves all hearts.

DRAMATIC AFFAIRS.

ON Monday and Tuesday evenings an original dramatic version of "Enoch Arden; or, Under the Palm," from Tennyson's poem of that name, was produced at Maguire's Opera House. Some two years since a similar dramatization, by "Trem," a well-known feuillotonist of this city, was produced with the additional peculiarity of being much better received by the public. Wednesday evening, the Dead Heart, in which Mr. Adams sustained more than his usual reputation as "Robert Landry" was played.

Thursday was presented that old sterling comedy The School for Scandal. "Sir Peter Teazle," represented in the person of Harry Edwards, is an almost perfect embodiement of the old-fashioned, honest, irascible English gentleman. In the screen scene, when he catches a glimpse of the supposed French milliner's dress, Edward's face moulds itself into an expression suggestive of the fact that the old gentleman had seen quite as much naughtiness as was proper for him in his younger days. We mean "Sir Peter," not Edwards. As "Charles Surface," Adams is good, yet does not, to us, realize the refined rake and spendthrift. Friday evening, Wild Oats was again played. Its frequent repetition is sufficient proof of well-deserved popularity.

This afternoon, Mr. Adams appears once more in The Marble Heart, and this evening in Richard III.

Next week, the Shakesperian drama is to be resurrected, Adams on Monday night playing Hamlet, and on Tuesday, Othello.

During the week, the Black Rook has held sway at the Metropolitan.

The operatic ballet spectacle of Giselle; or The Night Dancers, was brought out on Thursday night in a most commendable style. It is a combination of operatic gems, graceful dances and striking tableaux. It is difficult to say which is most deserving of praise the ballet or the operatic features this in performance. Miss Emma Howson, as "Giselle," and Miss Clelia, as "Mary," were perfect embodiements of grace and witchery.

To-day a matinee will be given, embracing "Kate Kearny," concluding with at A Kiss in the Dark. On Monday evening, this theatre opens with a new combination company. Mr. J. H. Vinson will make his first appearance as "Grimaldi," supported by two old favorites of the public, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Jackson. Mr. Jackson is an actor who has given the public, perhaps, all the breadth of humor they desired, but is fully capable of finer delineations in this speciality, and also of much power when it is required. Mrs. Jackson is not merely an actress, but a lady of culture, taste, and refinement. She has been obliged to endure an endless amount of the drudgery pertaining to a regular member of a theatrical company, and often been placed far below her inferiors. Yet this has not prevented her genius and ability from flashing out, and we predict for her the time when her present aspirations will be her realizations.

Views Barefooted.—An account of personal observation experience and adventure, in making the tour of Europe, on a capital of $181 00, in greenbacks, is what we understand that Mr. Keeler promises the public in his lecture, to be delivered next Tuesday evening, at Maguires Academy of Music. We do not know whether the lecturer undertakes to impart to his hearers the secret by which he was enabled to make the grand tour in a manner so economical, but there is some probability that it will leak out in the course of his lecture. Had Mr. Keeler "spoke his piece" earlier, there are many of us who might now have been enjoying ourselves at the Exposition. From some fragmentary portions of Mr. Keeler's experiences abroad, which we have heard, they are by no means of the commonplace order. Europe has now become the common ground where all the civilized world meet, to make reconnoisances on one another, and to fight their battles of opinion, fashion, and taste. The story of a returned scout, therefore, who like Mr. Keeler has taken close and keen observations of all the belligerents, and mingled freely with many of the classes into which they are divided, can not fail to prove highly interesting.

Removal.—The demand for the California Grape Brandy Bitters, have forced Messrs. F. & P. J. Cassin to remove to the large store, No 523, Front street, nearly opposite their old locality, where they will be prepared to furnish the trade with all the celebrated Grape Brandy Bitters that they want. No more disappointments in orders after this.

Philadelphia Restaurant. This old established Restaurant, formally on Montgomery street, is now located on Pine street, a few doors above Montgomery, one door this side of the New Market. It is one of the best kept Restaurants in the city. Muller and Bergold, the Proprietors, are excellent and experienced caterers.

IDENTITIES.

IF I am sad and often prone,
In spirit, let it well atone—
Sorrow is sacred, and mine own.

And sorrow doth absolve, and teach
The spirit calm and noble speech,
And setteth wisdom in its reach.

If I delight to serve the Lord,
I do it of mine own accord,
And have my passing sweet reward.

If I desire eternity,
Then is it calling ont to me
With a still voice, persuasively.

I follow where my longing is;
Convictions are authorities
To guide aright, not otherwise.

If I am taken in the snare,
My better self was unaware,
And proper penance I will share:

When unaware the temple throngs
With money-changers, frauds and wrongs,
I beat them out with whips and thongs.

With mortifying woe and pain,
I purge and purify the fane,
And enter to myself again.

Arise, my spirit, and rejoice!
Whatever symbol is thy choice,
Is favored by a heavenly voice.

For all my holy thoughts, and good,
Are invitations, not withstood—
As echoes in a hollow wood.

Schisms and heresies are rife
With every foolish sect at strife;
Above them all is purer life.

Above them all I place my trust,
And worship where my mind is thrust:
Believing faith is ever just.

BASHFULNESS.

A MODEST and virtuous young man, on first going into society, is apt to be sorely perplexed upon the question how to make himself agreeable to ladies. He need not be ashamed of his perplexity. Washington Irving, in one of his early sketches, confesses that a well-dressed lady was an object perfectly "awful" to his young imagination. We were once acquainted with a gentleman of distinction in public life, the father of several accomplished daughters, who could not, even to his fiftieth year, enter a drawing-room where ladies were present without painful embarrassment. It is certainly a good sign in a young man to stand in some awe of the beautiful sex. A person of coarse and vulgar mind, who thinks more of himself than his best friends think of him, and who knows little of the worth of a good woman's heart, rushes fearlessly in where an Irving or an Addison would blush to tread. Bear this in mind, young gentlemen who blush and stammer in the company of ladies: the girls are as much afraid of you as you are of them. You are awkward in your manners, you think. If you think so, it is likely that your friends think otherwise; for the really ill-bred fellows that we have known have never suspected their ill-breeding. And, after all, what is good-breeding but habitual good-nature? The simple fact that you wish to please is a proof that you possess, or will soon acquire, the power to do so. The good heart and well-informed mind will soon give grace to the demeanor, or will so abundently atone for the want of it, that its absence will never be noticed. Besides, the ladies—that is, most of them—like a man who is simple in his manners, provided that they see that there is substance and worth in him. Graceful manners and ready wit are good as far as they go. But be sure of this, O bashful, blushing youth, that, in the society of ladies and of men, you will pass, in the long run, for what you are worth—no more—no less. The art of pleasing, therefore, is nothing more than the art of becoming an honest, kind, intelligent and high-minded man. Such a man, be he graceful as Chesterfield or awkward as Caliban, all worthy women trust and love.

Woward's Gardens.—Despite the attractions offered at other, and in point of elegance, less matured places of resort, Woodward's Gardens still hold an ever-increasing and well-deserved favor in the public estimation. Among other attractions lately received, is an immense polar bear, killed on a piece of drift ice twenty-five miles from land. This bear had visited the North Pole. A beautiful pair of Mexican antelopes, animals rarely seen, cannot fail to be of interest to the lovers of natural history. If you wish a quiet, shady retreat from the dust and turmoil of the city, visit Woodward's Gardens.

Philadelphia Brewery.—This establishment is the largest beer brewery in this city, employing an immense capital, and keeping numerous wagons bearing the insignia "P. B.," constantly in service in supplying the city trade. Their shipments of beer to the interior is enormous; and the strangers on the boats are often puzzled over the trade mark. A group around their barrels, on the Capital, the other evening, suggested "Prize Beer," "Peoples' Beer," and "Pays Big," as solutions to the initials—they were all correct.

The California made Carriages, Buggies, and Wagons have decided preference over the imported article, and the business in branch of our manufactories has been rushing this year. Larkins & Co., Nos. 631 and 634 Howard street, have sold off all their manufactured vehicles of every description, and have numerous orders crowding upon them for the furnishing up of more. California vehicles rate A No. 1.

NALIGNANI'S PARIS GUIDE.

[Translated for Every Saturday from Le Temps.]

THE public are duped! A stranger in Paris needs a conscientious guide. A long experience of Parisian life, and the tender sympathy we feel for our fellow-citizens in the provinces, and for strangers generally, authorize us to believe that we have condensed in the following pages all the information useful to him.

When the stranger reaches the Paris railway station he will take a carriage to drive to some hotel. He must be very polite with the driver. A few years since a hack-driver named Collingnon, who had reason to complain of a provincial's courtesy, bluntly shot him down. It is true Collingnon was guillotined, but this reparation which sufficed to society was illusory to the assassinted provincial. We cannot guide the stranger in selecting an hotel. There are in Paris furnished lodgings from $2,000 a month to one dollar a day; the furnished lodgings of the latter class are, however, unfurnished. A bed and its accessories may be found in them, but the stranger must keep a good eye on these treasures. Recently a young man from Castelnaudary stopped at an hotel, whose name we shall not give, because it does not merit a puff. He noticed the night of his arrival that his bed had two mattresses and a spring mattress. He was mortified to find the next day that he had only one mattress, and on the third day to find that he had only the spring mattress. When he complained to the landlord the latter replied, "New travelers have come." The young man is somewhat consoled by having an electric bell in his chamber. This is a luxury which was unknown in hotels which had mattresses on their bedsteads. The travelers should show stoical indifference to the petty frauds of the tavern-keeper. It is customary to pay for each candle 20 cents a day. An ingenious provincial upon seeing this charge, called his landlord's attention to his economical habit of going to bed without a light, he had not even singed the wick with a match. The landlord, who was a just, but severe man, replied, "Gods! I hope you did not. I don't know what would become of us landlords, if travelers used the candles charged to them in their bills!"

Attendance is likewise charged in the bills at the minimum of a franc a day. It is useless to tell the landlord one was obliged to wait on one's self. He will reply his house is provided with the electric telegraph, which is the best thing yet invented. This is the use of that invention: the waiters assemble around the electric plate and make a pool. Each takes a series of the plate, and the first number called of the series wins the pool. The waiter who has the best chance is he who takes care to leave the traveler's boots down stairs. He is sure the traveler will soon ring for them. Independently of this general law an hotel chamber may present peculiar inconveniences, which the traveler would do well to avoid. An exhibitor who was fortunate enough to find a bed when he reached Paris, was awakened in the morning after his arrival by an insupportable heat. He summoned his landlord and said to him, "I do not know what I feel, but it seems to me I am half roasted." The landlord replied, "I know what's the matter, the kitchen chimney runs by the head of your bed. This chamber is the most popular room in the house all winter; but if you like to have another, we have not another to give."

The traveler should carefully avoid leaving his key in the door. There is no danger of the waiter's calling to know if anything be wanted, but there are in Paris a numerous class of early risers who call on strangers to bid them good morning. When the stranger wakes he finds nothing but his night-dress left him to pay visits in. When the thief escapes there is no harm done; but if he is arrested and arraigned before the Police Court, the stranger is reduced so low as to envy the rogue's position. The latter who is well dressed, tells gracefully and in a sprightly manner, the capital practical joke he played at the provincial's expense, amid the roars of laughter of the audience, and the presiding magistrate himself is unable to repress a gracious smile when the countryman with tears in his eyes says, what he regrets the most is a pair of socks his godmother knit him. Sometimes the rogue, when he possesses a lofty soul, offers to pull off the godmother's socks and restore them to the godson, but these examples are rare.

Travelers who bear a name exposed to lively competition, such as Benoit, Durand, or Godard, would do well to add their Christian name to this surname, otherwise their letters will run the risk of taking a wrong direction to some homonyme. My friend Masson, of Lons-le-Saulnier, has no chance; he has not heard a word from his family since he has been in Paris. Another Masson replies to his wife's letters, and kisses his children. We say add their Christian name, for if they would add an aristocratic designation they must be on their guard and first ask leave of the keeper of the seals. (His address is Place Vendome.) The other day there was a gentleman, who, not satisfied with his family name, Philippee, determined to tack du Tailly to it. To expiate this deplorable ambition he has been sentenced to $100 fine and to see his name published in Le Moniteur. Now it will not escape the traveler's attention that the publication of one's name in Le Moniteur is agreeable only when it announces one's appointment to a lucrative office.

As a general rule the first thing a traveler does when he wakes is to go to breakfast. This morning meal is more or less abolished in Parisian families, but it is still in great honor in the country. The choice of a restaurant varies, like that of hotels, with the capacity and purse of eaters. In the restaurants on the Boulevards you may get three eatable stalks of asparagus for two dollars; in restaurants of a lower class you are served with salsify instead of asparagus. If the former is rather bitter in the mouth, it is quite sweet on the bill,—at least in comparison with asparagus. A trap is laid in all restaurants for strangers; the springe is in the shape of a small salver, in which twelve crayfish, pale from prolonged vigils, lie on a parsley-bed. If the stranger fall into the trap the ransom is eighty cents. Sausage, tunny fish, and in general, all fragments from the kitchen, are excellent bait to entrap strangers. It is a culinary maxim that strangers eat anything and everything. You may find at Bignon's tolerable Chateau Yquen at $10 a bottle. Avoid counterfeits. All the restaurants of Paris sell Chateau Yquem at $3 a bottle. It is mere toilette vinegar. You may, without detecting the least difference, drink instead a phial of Jean Vincent Bully's aromatic vinegar, which costs only twenty-five cents, if you are an officer in the army or a judge, or fifteen cents if you have brass enough to pass yourself off as a hair-dresser. I would for nothing in the world accept the responsibility of forcing a restaurant on my readers. I know of only two good ones in Paris, Brebant's and Voisin's. I am less familiar with the Café Anglais, and the Maison Dorée, but both these restaurants are recommended by eaters of weight. As for the other restaurants, they are what are called "on the fork, please." Paris, however, is a city of infinite resource. As all the strangers are not millionnaires, like most Parisians, it may be worth while to point out restaurants to them where for thirty-two cents they may eat a dinner for which a shipwrecked mariner on the wreck of the Medusa would cheerfully have given sixty-two and a half cents. The miracle of the marriage in Cana is renewed every day in these restaurants. They not only turn water into wine, but sea-dogs into turbots, geese into pheasants, and turnips into pine-apples As the game is stuffed it can be eaten at all seasons. We must, after all, acknowledge these minor restaurants serve up their ragouts with a good deal of conscience. Unfortunately they cannot add butter. We are lost in conjectures about the methods used by these ingenious cooks to substitute the art for nature, as they must do when marketing is as high as it is now.

But we dwell too long on these festivals of matter. What if the stranger do die of hunger! The prime consideration is to lift up his soul and feed his mind. In this respect Paris offers him a most varied bill of fare. We need not recommend strangers to visit our museums, our collections of curiosities, and the Garden of Plants. A stranger who should return home without seeing the bears of the Garden of Plants in their ditch, would be universally shunned. The English are in the habit of going down into the ditch to give the bears gingerbread. The bears are very fond of gingerbread, but prefer Englishmen, and often eat their benefactors. Strangers would consequently do well, instead of going down into the ditch as the English do, to tie the gingerbread with a bit of twine and throw it into the tree. This exercise is in great favor in the fashionable circle of foot-soldiers and wet-nurses.

It is bad taste to stop before the cages of animals and express aloud unfavorable opinions about them. Ill-bred people are frequently heard to exclaim before the seal or the camel, "What an ugly creature!" Nature, which is infinite in her forms, is always respectable, and her several species owe each other a reciprocal indulgence. Beauty is relative; it is a pure convention, which varies with instincts. The most beautiful woman in Paris could not seduce a seal. We are accustomed to say, when we speak of porcupines or heroes, "what a queer-looking creature! How ridiculous 't is!" Let us be modest. Do we know what animals, who have not the gift of speech, think of those to whom speech was given to drivel? I recently went with two country people to the Garden of Plants. We, of course, stopped before the monkey-house. There was a little dandy, whose new frock-coat did not fall below the neck of the femur, a little hat, about the size worn by children five years old, rested on the crown of his head, which was parted by a line running from the nape of the neck, and carefully raked; his thin legs choked in tight pantaloons, looked like two umbrellas in their cases. The first monkey that saw him began to grin in the most indecent manner, and calling his comrades they began to grin at the dandy with an impertinence which quite revolted me. The monkeys' only excuse was in our own want of courtesy in our treatment of animals, which differ from us in form if not in substance.

Neither is it unusual to see sensible people become indignant at the voracity of the "ferocious" animals. I cannot avoid observing that beside the use of knife, fork, dishes, and silver (our tables are spread with more taste than theirs), and the amiability or our ladies in baring their shoulders to eat beef stewed in Madeira, there is, beside the degree of cooking, no sensible difference between our appetites and those of the wolf and jackal. And even this difference seems to tend to lessen; there are some doctors who have taken it into their noddles to make their patients eat raw meat. Really, I cannot help thinking we deceive ourselves, and that calves led by some brutal butcher to the shambles are not far from looking upon us as "ferocious" animals. Fortunately they have not the gift of speech, else they might annoy the Government with their grievances.

The stranger should read the newspapers assiduously. The political newspapers will tell him all they know about peace, war, and the intentions of the Government. True, 'tis rather vague, and I should not advise the stranger to speculate in stocks on their information. But for two cents the stranger may procure newspapers which will hide nothing whatsoever from him of the private life of duchesses and ambassadresses. If the stranger never witnessed a duel, and should like to procure that emotion with a free ticket, he may find in these last mentioned newspapers an exact indication of the day, hour, and place where the young Viscount de la Bichardiere will meet, sword in hand, the Baron de Gruenville, in consequence of the latter's insinuation that the Viscount had at the gaming-table more good luck than a gentleman should have.

The stranger should likewise read very attentively the law newspapers, which will teach him slang and initiate him to the three thousand tricks rogues possess for pluming young strangers. There is occasionally a fellow guillotined on the Place de la Roquette. This is a sight which attracts a great many spectators. They go there in companies to present fatigue, for spectators are obliged to take their places the previous evening, and to spend the night on their legs. The stranger would do well to deny himself the pleasure.

The stranger should feel least uneasiness about the manner of spending the evenings. Concerts, theatres, and balls, will dispute his company. If he has any acquaintances in the Ministries, he may get a ticket to the annual ball of the Minister of Marine. When he goes to it he should hire the costume of a Swiss Admiral. As for the theatres, they make so much noise the stranger will be stunned by it, and cannot avoid educating himself at his own expense. He will ingenuously go to the theatre which advertises that it nightly turns away hundreds from its doors, and find the whole house consists of thirty claquers, all fast asleep. May be he will succumb to the temptation of carrying his wife to the Theatre Beaumarchais, which admits ladies free. I must mention this innovation, which will form an epoch in the history of French gallantry. But the world has a deep-rooted prejudice that there is no amusement to be had where there is no toll to be paid. After all, the stranger must trust to his own experience. Newspapers have, in dramatic literature, as undecided opinions as they have in political matters. For instance the Theatre Lyrique is playing a new opera. My evening paper tells me 'tis sublime. My morning paper tells me 'tis fatiguing. It seems these two judgments have a commentary. I asked the applauding critic, "Is it really sublime?" He replied, "Yes, it is really sublime, but it is very tiresome." I said to the other critic, "Come, tell me, is it really as fatiguing as you pretend?" He answered, "Indeed it is, but there are magnificent things in it."

PERSEVERE against disappointments. Keep your temper. Employ leisure in study, and always have some work in hand. Be punctual and methodical in business, and never procrastinate. Never be in a hurry. Preserve self-possession, and do not be talked out of conviction. Rise early, and be an economist of time. Maintain dignity without the appearance of pride; manner is something to everybody, and everything with some. Be guarded in discourse, attentive and slow to speak Never acquiesce in immoral or pernicious opinions. Be not forward to assign reasons to those who have no right to ask. Think nothing in conduct unimportant or indifferent. Rather act than follow examples. Practice strict temperance, and in your transactions remember your final account.

THE Japanese are polite and at the same time inquisitive. They salute one upon the slightest pretext, by placing the hands upon the knees, shutting half up like a well-oiled jack-knife, delivering the word "Ohio" in their most seductive tones. They will mount your porch and peer steadfastly through your parlor windows until they are discovered, when, instead of being abashed, they smile with singular sweetness and look again.

THE POOR "PIENT."—The following toast was given at a printers' supper: "The printer—independent as a wood-sawyer, proud as Lucifer, poor as Job's turkey, and the personification of intelligence."

A CHIME of 42 bells in the French Exposition, is played like a piano-forte with perfect ease to any tune. Four years were spent in the construction of the instrument.

SUPERFICIAL writers and talkers, like the mole, may think themselves deep when they are exceedingly near the surface.

KISSING HER FEMALE COUSIN.

YOUR coming in last night, my lady love,
Was somewhat sudden. I was helping Nell
To tie the ribbon of her ringlets:
She set the crimson of her mouth up—well,
I'm flesh and blood—and then you, singing, came
Into the room, and tossed your head for shame.

I saw a sort of maiden northern lights
Shoot up your cheeks and tremble in your eyes;
I like such things. I like to see the wind
Drive frightened clouds across the skies;
Like the sea, and, when it's easily had,
A pretty woman—very, very mad!

I like the dangerous and regal air
(You bear a queen's name, and a queen you are,)
With which you donned your Thibet opera cloak,
And clasped it with a diamond like a star,
'Twas charming in my mistress—but, my life,
It would not be so charming in my wife.

I like wild things, as I have said, but then
I should not like to own them. Who would be
Proprietor of earthquakes, or loose hurricanes,
Or comets plunging in celestial seas?
Or wed a maid that could, if she should please,
Give me a touch of one and all of these?

Not I. Don't let a female thunder storm
Brood in your eyes, with every nod, and then
A flash of angry lightning. You have had
Your March and April; now in June again,
And let your fine cut eyebrows' silken span
Be brows of promise to your favorite man!

I've had my laugh, and you your pout, and now
(You'll spoil that rose-bud if you twist it so!)
Give me both hands, that I may say, "Good Bess,
The good Queen Bess," and kiss you ere I go—
The good Queen Bess, whose heart, and mind and face,
Teach me to love ALL women—as a race!

So, when I kissed your pretty cousin Nell,
I honored one who taught me to admire
Fair women in their twenties—don't you see?
But then, dear Bess, as I was standing by her,
Her lips quite close—now this is entre nous—
Upon my soul, I made believe 'twas you!

—T. B. ALDRICH.

FENIANS ON TRIAL.

IT is the 26th of April—a raw, chilly, dismal day. A keen east wind sweeps down the streets and handsome quays of Dublin, dashing small drifts of gravel in the faces of those abroad. Well-clad passengers walked faster to give the blood some life and warmth. There are many poorly clothed; these clasp and fold their hands, or beat them against their shoulders. All have a dry, pinched, withered look, and you hear more than once the old Irish saying, "When the wind is from the east, 'tis good for neither man nor beast." The sun breaks out fitfully from leaden clouds, but the river, Anna Liffey, cold and grey, is fringed here and there with white where the fast ebbing tide rushes against a reef of limestone. Pale-faced, anxious looking men, who have not slept last night, rush to the car-stands and dart away regardless of the cold. They have that on hand which must be done—"hail, rain, or snow." They look like lawyers' clerks, over-worked and worn, hurrying to "refresh" counsel or hunt down a witness who has stolen away. Police are placed thickly in the streets, two together; they carry swords to day, and have, I am told, revolvers ready capped and loaded. I meet a long line of them, tall, strong and resolute looking men, in dark blue tunics, moving slowly in Indian file upon the outer edge of the flagway. A bugle sound from the barracks close at hand tells us that the troops are on parade. The Castle gates are closed and covered with iron-plates, loopholed for musketry. Over the black armour I see the brass helmets and flowing plumes of dragoons; higher still, but some way behind, the wind plays among the fluttering pennons of the Lancers. From the windows of houses opposite the gates, the Fenians, if there were any there, could see into the Castle Yard and witness all these preparations. A volley would tell with dreadful effect upon the troops. But there are no Fenians there, and if there were, not one would desire to become a martyr. The house formerly occupied by Hopper, "merchant tailor"—the recipient of drafts for large amounts transmitted from American "leaders"—stands close by at the corner of a narrow lane. Hopper was imprisoned, and the house is let to others now.

On St. Patrick's night a second Fenian rising was expected, and then the authorities warned the dwellers in these houses that they might be required to remove at once and make room for troops. No second rising took place and the occupiers pursue their trades as usual. We pass down Parliament-street and over Essex bridge, and here we shiver under the blight of the bitter wind. The corners of the bridge are guarded by police, for the prisoners coming from Kilmainham must pass this way. We reach the entrance to Mary's Abbey, now a narrow street, but once the site of a great monastry well endowed. They show you still, a vaulted crypt here and holy well. At the next turn still upon the left, we enter Green street. High in the air, looms the dark steeple of St. Michan's, whose vaults preserve and mummify the bodies of the dead. Close in front I see a fragment of a flanking tower still retaining a few loopholes. This, and a long dark wall, are the remains of Newgate, and to this spot flow the streams of life from many points to-day.

Close to these remains of Newgate, are the Sessions House and the Commission Court. Over the entrance to the former hangs a balcony: a light iron structure indeed, but the platform of death. The hinges of the trap are rusty now. A narrow doorway in the wall gave their last exit to the criminals, who passed from the gloomy Press-room out in the sunlight, and gazed for a moment upon a sea of upturned faces far down below. Many years have passed since an execution took place here, for the laws now are very mild, and there is little deadly crime in Ireland save Treason. Let us avoid the steps and the shadow of the scaffold, and pass under a modern Doric portico. The Commission Court is within; but before we enter, let us turn and look upon the crowd outside.

There is no feverish or excited multitude such as you would expect. Knots of men and idle boys and girls gather here and there, speaking little. They are all from the lowest class, and are here because they have nothing to do elsewhere. These knots part and break up before the mounted police—light active men, who easily keep a wide passage clear. The prisoners will be brought into court by a passage in the rear where a strong guard preserves an open space. Few attempts to trespass on the forbidden ground. The victims of Fenianism, like those of the plague, may be pitied, but few care to touch them. While I look and wonder where are the twenty thousand armed conspirators, there is a slight movement among the people. A suppressed cry is heard, and the troops take close order. The sharp quick sound of cavalry rings on the pavement. Mounted police—lancers—more police—police on Irish jaunting-cars, ready to jump off, on the instant—and then the prison van: a long dark carriage this, gloomy as a hearse, though bearing the cypher of the Queen. The accused are brought out separately, and enveloped in a cloud of police. You see a line of heads moving slowly up to and within the doorway, and that is all. No cheer is raised, no sign of popular sympathy is given, not even a prayer for a "good deliverance" is uttered. The crowd come here, it is plain, through curiosity, and not from any deeper feeling. At the corners of streets a few stones are thrown, once or twice, wildly at the police, or a feeble execration is pronounced. But in the precincts of the Commission Court there is no manifestation of pity.

I had seen the court before the judges, jurymen, counsel, witnesses, prisoners and people filled it. It is a cockpit of a place, wholly inadequate for trials such as these. At the central wall, under a canopy, the judges will sit; immediately below are the places set apart for the chief officers of the court; lower still is a long table with the witness chair. Round this table are ranged the counsel engaged, and a favored few. Facing the judges is the dock, into which a passage leads from a strong room below. When the words of the judge, "Remove the prisoner," are heard, he drops out of sight and is seen no more.

And now steal in, by side-doors, unnoticed before, officials connected with the court or with the trials. There is a rustling of papers on the table. Some one arranges the cushions and footstools for the judges, and places pens and ink ready. Then stream in, densely packed, barristers, attorneys, jurymen, and the public. Round the court there is a wall of police; close to and behind the dock are many. The "Crier" takes his stand in an elevated pulpit on the right side of the table. He carries a long black wand with a slit in the top, by which papers and documents are fixed for transmission from counsel to counsel, from witness to jury, and from the crier to the judges. The court is now oppressively crowded, but a stranger would be impressed by the business-like silence of the place. When the accused appears, there is a slight stir and turning of faces toward the dock, but no excitement or expression of sympathy. In that narrow dock once stood Theobald Wolfe Tone; the two Sheareses, whose bodies, strangely preserved, are shown in the ancient crypt of St. Michan's church close by; Robert Emmet, and other leaders of insurrectionary movements. From generation to generation the floor has been trodden by rebels doomed to death or imprisonment. Only last year there stood here facing the judges, many now expiating their treason in Portland prison. I wonder will this alternation of crime and punishment ever end?

The trials may be said to have commenced on the 26th of April, but the court opened on the 24th. The jurymen summoned answered generally to their names, and yet they knew that an assassination committee existed, and that the names of judges, jury, witnesses, and prosecutors were noted down for vengeance. Such a list was found on one of those recently condemned. I saw him in the dock, bearing marks of the terrible blow he had received from one of his own revolvers, in a struggle between three policemen whom he had fired at in broad day and in the open street. Two men, suspected to be informers, had been shot dead; three others had been severely wounded; they would not say by whom. No guess could be made respecting the numbers and place of this murderous Vehm-Gericht. But the Panel answered to their names fearlessly. As they came forward, they were challenged "for cause." The cause was almost invariably disallowed after tedious discussions, and then they were challenged "peremptorily" on the part of the prisoners. Two whole days were spent before twelve men could be chosen to try the accused. On the evening of the 25th of April the jury was at last chosen, and on the morning of the 26th the trials began.

Almost without exception the principal conspirators on trial preserved a calm and dignified deportment. There was nothing theatrical or extravagant in their demeanor. Occasionally they exchanged a few words with their solicitors. Once, when the very man who was to have led the rebel forces in the south, rose, like a sceptre, to the witness chair, one of the accused changed his position with the other, and fixed a stern gaze upon the informer for hours.

I look from the dock to the witness chair. The informer cannot tell his own true name. There is a mystery or romance or shame about his birth. As a child he was sometimes called by his mother's name; as a man, by one indicating a connexion with an old Irish family. In youth, he served with the British army in the Crimea; then he fought under the famous Kirby Smith as a faithful soldier of the Confederate army. When the civil war was over, he joined, as hundreds joined, the I. R. B., but he united commercial pursuits with preparation for treason. He was trusted beyond other chiefs of the conspiracy, and, until the moment of his arrest, was faithful. He revenged his own betrayal, as he said, by betraying others. His evidence was valuable; not so much because it was damnatory to the accused, as for its thorough exposure of the weakness and folly of the conspiracy

In the city of Dublin, with three hundred and forty thousand inhabitants, they were, he said, from fourteen thousand to eighteen thousand professed Fenians. Some of these formed the wretched rabble that moved out to Tallaght, and fled at the first touch of the police. There were at hand, to arm these eighteen thousand men, only three thousand weapons; but what weapons? Pikes, old bayonets, broken scythes, daggers made of iron hoops, and sharpened knives. The rifles and revolvers which were to sweep away the British army did not count three hundred. In Cork, the preparations were still more preposterous. Fifteen hundred weapons of motley character to arm twenty thousand Fenians! This man's evidence exposes to all the world, the miserable hollowness of the whole confederacy. But he is released from a torturing cross-examination at last, broken in health, and apparently despairing. He swooned on the moment of his arrest, and almost his last words, uttered with some emotion, are: "If I swooned, would to God I had never survived!"

Another Queen's evidence of a very different stamp appears. His appearance is anything but prepossessing. Conspiracy can only be baffled by the agency of conspirators, and this informer has done his work thoroughly. He prided himself upon his doings, and claimed credit as the spoiler of the plot. His name was taken (how or by whom none knows) from one of Virgil's sweetest pastorals. He, too, had fought in America, but as a lieutenant in the Federal armies. Thus waifs and strays from that gigantic struggle appeared in succession as informers on a witness table in Dublin. For seven months this man had been an active member of the conspiracy, but all the while he was also the paid agent of the government. He it was whose secret information frustrated the raid on Chester, caused the arrest of Massey in the nick of time, and put the police on the track of M'Cafferty. I noticed that this witness was careful of his style, and corrected himself when he spoke without due grammatical precision. He was quick, ready, not easily abashed—the very man to be an agent of conspiracy, or its betrayer.

With the examination of the informers, all interest in the trial ended until the verdict of the jury had been pronounced, and the guilty were called upon to state why sentence of death should not be pronounced upon them. The independent evidence was clear, the facts were patent, the accused even boasted of the part they had taken. Some of the condemned spoke bitterly, respecting the deception practised on them by the chief movers of the plot in America. They had been told that a hundred thousand men, armed and disciplined, were ready to spring to their feet the moment they had leaders. Others declared they would act again as they had done before.

The barbarous form of sentence delivered on those found guilty of high treason, makes the blood run cold. A quiet movement of the judge's hand stops the breath of every one in the court; an odor like that of the grave seems to fill the air as the judge slowly lifts up and places on his head the small black velvet cap with lappets of the same funeral color. A little thing this, but ominous of the most awful change. The silence, deep as that of the tomb, is broken only by the tremulous voice of the minister of Justice telling the living man, with all his pulses thrilling, that he must surely die.

The condemned are sentenced to be quartered, and in fearful mockery their severed limbs are said to be placed at the disposal of her Majesty. Is it right, or fitting, or Christian, that the title of a merciful Sovereign should be mixed up with such a sentence as this? The statute-book contains much that is obsolute; but why this? Such frightful but useless accessories cast a barbarous coloring over the remainder of the sentence, however rightcously deserved, and foreigners believe that with all our civilization, our mode is merciless and sanguinary.

The condemned are brought back to the place from whence they came, to experience, we now know, the blessed prerogative of mercy. We breathe more freely now. The court is rapidly emptied, and the keen air from without rushes through the building. The Crown lawyers have been mild and generous. The young and thoughtless have been lightly dealt with. A voice within each man's breast said that the Queen would give life even to the most guilty. The Commission is ended; may it never have to execute such work again!

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, JULY 27, 1867.

"HOW TO TREAT EDITORS."

NEARLY a year ago the proprietor of the New York Herald while discussing with his architect the arrangement of the editorial rooms in his projected new building, is reported to have declared that he meant to "show the papers how to treat their editors," meaning thereby, that it was his intention to set said papers an example by providing his corps of writers with convenient, well-arranged apartments in which to do their work, amply provided with all aids and appliances that facilitate literary labor. This intention he appears to have carried out in the new Herald Building, with a disregard of mere expense characteristic of the man in all those matters connected with his business, in which his sagacity shows him that liberal expenditure is more for his own interests than narrow economy. If the rooms set apart to the gentlemen who, in their several capacities, supply the "copy" that fills the broad columns of the Herald, are not furnished with the "carpets and curtains, cushions and grate-fires" which the Round Table declares that people in general associate with the idea of editorial labor, they are, at least, said to be well lighted and ventilated, and supplied with handsome and convenient desks and tables, and with ample libraries of reference. If the New York dailies stood in need of a lesson of this kind, the need is much greater in San Francisco, where the editorial rooms of our leading journals are much inferior in every particular of convenience and accommodation, to those of the former city as they were ten years ago—since which time it is scarcely to be presumed that they have become any worse. Until the removal of the Alta to its new building, the place assigned its editors for their daily work, was literally a "den;" in fact, it needed but a heavy bolt on the door, and a grated window, to realize the idea of a dungeon Now, however, the editorial rooms of that paper are the best in the city.

The worst feature of the manner in which newspaper proprietors in the United States treat their editors is, that it is significant of the fact that the former regard the latter in the light of mere serviceable drudges. The "business man" is often a more important personage than the writer of "leaders," receives a larger compensation, and is treated with more deference. So, too, while the counting room, or business office, must be a model of neatness and convenience, a dismal apartment, with a single dilapidated desk and three or four chairs, is good enough for editorial purposes. Happy the writer on a daily paper who can call even this wretched hole his own. Most generally he is expected to share it with some fellow drudge. But Mr. Bennet's "Example to the newspapers" goes farther than the mere attempt to show that the men who perform editorial labor ought to have pleasant and comfortable surroundings. It inculcates the further lesson that they should be treated with gentlemanly consideration; that they should not be vexatiously or unnecessarily interfered with in their several departments; that such a system of division of labor should be adopted as that no one individual should be expected to do the work of two or three, and that the compensation should be proportioned to the character and value of the services rendered. In all these particulars—in respect to the accommodations of the places where they do their work, to the quantity of work required of them, to the amount of compensation paid, to the consideration shown them by publishers and proprietors, the editors of California—we refer to those who are engaged on leading and prosperous daily papers—are much worse off than their brethren in New York or in the large Eastern cities generally. The ablest writers on our most influential journals, whose proprietors have amassed wealth in the business, seldom receive as large salaries as are paid to first-class book keepers, and we do not believe there is one of these journals whose principal editor—we mean the writing editor, not a publisher who chooses to dub himself editor—receives as much per month as persons employed in the printing office or counting room.

THE POEM signed "M.," received and accepted for publication in last week's CALIFORNIAN, has been mislaid, and we have to apologize to the author for its non-appearance in our last issue.

THERE may be as honest a difference between two men as between two thermometers. The difference in both cases may arise from difference in positions.

AN "IMBECILE PULPIT."

THE Rev. Dr. Samuel M. Hopkins, moderator of the New School Presbyterian General Assembly, which convened last month at Rochester, New York, appears to have stirred up quite a lively theological breeze by declaring in the course of an address to the body over which he presided, that the Episcopal denomination had "an imbecile pulpit." Of course, a remark of this character, made publicly on such an occasion, whether having any foundation in truth or not, was sure to produce a shrill outcry in various quarters; indeed, the existence of the notion that there was a bare soupcon of critical justice in the blunt comment so inopportunely uttered, would be likely to intensify rather than to soothe the indignation which had been aroused in Episcopalian bosoms. The daily papers of Rochester took up the matter with that peculiar zeal and ardor which daily papers invariably display when they rush into sectarian frays, as though none who ventured to handle topics of this kind could hope to escape the contagion of the odium theologicum. They came down upon the outspoken Doctor of Divinity in that austere and lofty style of moral disapprobation, the ability to assume which on suitable occasions, is one of the indispensable qualifications of the accomplished journalist. They were scandalized and shocked by the "uncharitable and unchristian" spirit of the remark, and sternly demanded "an official retraction" of it by the Assembly. Mr. Theodore Tilton of the New York Independent, in his assumed character of censor of the clergy, and general regulator of the churches, paused in the midst of his tearful lamentations over the defection of Mr. Beecher and the apostacy of Secretary Seward, to administer an official rebuke, and to read the sturdy Presbyterian a mild didactic lecture in the columns of his paper. All this, however, seems to have produced no other effect upon the contumacious offender, than still further to excite his combattiveness, having elicited from him a letter in which he aggravates the matter by attempting to justify his ungracious remark, and declaring that in making it, he innocently "supposed he was uttering a truism." "While the ministry of other Protestant churches," says the pugnacious Doctor, "is generally a preaching ministry, that of the Episcopal denomination is a prayer-book ministry. They are not taught to preach, but to read the service, and argue for their polity." Waxing more aggressive as he proceeds, he declares: "An 'essay after divine service,' formed on the model of the Homilies, obsolete in style, feeble in thought, and pointless in application, is the character of most of the sermons, even of their bishops and doctors of divinity," after which he comments sarcastically upon the "angry stir and buzzing that is made among the Episcopalians" by the "insertion of even so small a stick into their hive," and closes without a word of apology, or the slightest manifestation of penitence or even of compunction. Tilton publishes the Doctor's rebellious letter in his paper without a word of comment, and the controversy continued to stand at last advices, substantially in statu quo ante bellum.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION.

THE expectations of those sanguine Republicans who predicted that the rebellious feeling which manifested itself in certain quarters, immediately after the Sacramento nominations, was a temporary ebullition that would speedily subside under the pressure of party discipline, when it became apparent that harmony was absolutely necessary in order to secure party success, have thus far been grievously disappointed. The malcontents, far from showing any disposition to recede from their altitude of hostility to a certain portion of the Gorham ticket, seem to be more confirmed and obdurate in their contumacy than ever. A "split" in the Republican ticket now seems to be inevitable, and it is not altogether improbable that the existing dissention may result in throwing the election into the hands of the Democrats. Should such prove to be the case, it ought to be well understood outside of the State, that the election of the Democratic ticket is not to be understood as a defeat of the Union party of California. There can be no question that that party has a large majority in the State, a fact that will become apparent whenever a distinct issue upon principle, unembarrassed by the peculiar complications of the present canvass, shall be joined. Meantime, so far as great national questions are concerned, it is really a matter of little moment, whether Mr. Gorham or Mr. Haight is elected Governor of California. The defeat of the former, would be in no just sense the defeat of the Union party. It would be simply the overthrow of a local faction that has incurred the determined hostility of a large and influential class of Union men, without whose aid and co-operation the Democratic ticket would have stood no chance of success. These are facts which it it is highly desirable should be thoroughly understood by Republicans at the East.

NEW PUBLICATION.

LIBER LIBRORUM: Its Structure, Limitation, and Purpose. A Friendly Communication to a Reluctant Sceptic. New York: Charles Scribner & Co. 1867. San Francisco: A. Roman & Co., and H. H. Bancroft & Co.

The aim of this volume seems to be to establish a rational and philosophical theory of the inspiration of Scripture in opposition to the theory of verbal and literal inspiration maintained by Gaussen, and the majority of Protestant theologians of all denominations. While declaring his firm belief in the historical reality, and the supernatural origin of the Mosaic and Christian systems, and accepting the New Testament narratives of the Incarnation and Resurrection of Christ, he denounces the "bibliolatry" that idolizes the letter of the Scriptures as against the spirit of their contents, and the narrowness of that theological dogmatism that frames its creeds and catechisms in the words and phrases of the sacred writings, insisting upon the inspiration of every expression in its most literal sense. In short, he undertakes boldly to confront that momentous question which nearly fifty years ago, some of the most learned and enlightened Christian Doctors predicted, must eventually be met, notwithstanding the shock which its frank discussion would inevitably involve to the rooted prejudices of a multitude of pious minds. In 1835, the great and good Dr. Arnold, of Rugby, wrote that the discussion must come, and declared his settled conviction that it would end, in spite of the fears and clamors of the weak and bigoted, "in the higher exalting and more sure establishing of Christian truth." The author of the present volume believes the time for the profitable discussion of this grave question has now come, and he addresses himself to the task in a spirit of candor that wins the confidence of the reader in his good faith and sincerity, whatever impression may be made as to his adequacy to a task involving so many and great difficulties, and requiring so rare a combination of acquirements and great intellectual powers for its successful accomplishment. Had Coleridge lived to this time, and witnessed the present condition of religious thoughts and opinion, what an essay could he have written on this theme! Arnold himself, was, in a pre-eminent degree, qualified to treat it; and it is to be regretted that he thought the time for the discussion had not arrived, when he predicted that it was necessary and inevitable. The present writer, though by no means a Coleridge, or an Arnold, has opened the question, with a fair share of ability, taking up his position inside the Church, as a devout and revereat believer, but one who is, at the same time, fully resolved to utter his convictions like a brave and honest man, without regard to the outcry that may be raised by that class of good Christians who are either too ignorant, or too rooted in notions that they have learned to look upon as sacred, to be able to regard such novelties without horror. "The secret," he says, in his preface, "of the success which now attends publications intended to advance a destructive criticism, is that they speak to men already "perplext in faith, but pure in deeds," who received with their first instruction in Christianity, statements of doctrine which, in the time of mature reflection, appear to contradict the Divine instincts of justice, mercy, and truth—the image of God's own eternity in the heart of man. These doctrines taught, as necessary inferences, from, or as identical with, the facts of Christianity, were once acquiesced in as the creed of Christendom, but now, in not a few cases, repulsion follows the attempt to read and understand them by the "light of reason and conscience."

Thus, the main motive of the book seems to be a sincere desire to ascertain to what extent the traditional claims of the Bible, as heretofore presented by popular theologians, must be modified or abandoned in deference to the spirit of the age, and the results of modern critical inquiry. The writer has in view a class of men who are sceptics, but not scoffers; a class who are reluctant to abandon the faith in which they have been educated, but who, bewildered and perplexed by the reasonings of such writers as Renan, or perhaps even by the shallow objections presented by the unlettered and vulgar infidel, are in danger of settling down into a species of uncertain scepticism. The aim of the author is to remove the difficulties felt by this class of minds, and his method of accomplishing it is that of making such concessions to the rationalistic principle, as will seem much too liberal to a large majority of believers, and not quite liberal enough to a considerable class of thinkers, even in the Anglican communion who have long ago gone over the ground assumed in this volume, and advanced beyond it, without yielding, as they earnestly claim, one jot or tittle of doctrine essential to the Christian faith. Such concessions have been compared to the "attempt of the mariner to lighten the vessel in danger of shipwreck, by throwing overboard a portion of the cargo." But the comparison is more ingenious than just; a vessel cutting loose from a mass of driftwood which she had been towing unaware, and which had long impeded her progress, would furnish a much apter simile. The main concession, that the idea of the infallibility of the Bible in every portion of its contents is untenable, is no new one, and certainly has not been extorted from the theologians by the pressure of modern infidelity. Even before the Reformation, it was remarked that the Scriptures, themselves, nowhere put forward such a pretension; and long prior to the development of the modern "critical schools," either of Renan or Colenso, Edward Irving wrote against that "Idolatry of the Bible," which, he said, "expresseth itself in the holy—but I call it unholy—notion which they have taken up concerning inspiration, that the very words were inspired." Irving seems to us, to have gone quite as far as the present author. His exhortation is, "read this Word with what persuasion of its divine authority you presently have, and affect not more than you really have, for that is falsehood or superstition which God abhorreth. * * * That is to make the book an idol and then prostrate your soul unto it; and by so doing you shall make your soul a timorous creature of superstition, or a blind worshipper of sounds and sentences, but never a child of the Spirit of God."

The truth is, it is only those who are uninformed in ecclesiastical and theological history, as the great bulk even of intelligent and tolerably educated persons necessarily are, who can regard such "consessions" as those in question in the light of a portion of the cargo thrown overboad to avert shipwreck. Luther himself—to go no further back—whose contest was not with infidels or sceptics who "criticised" the Scriptures, but with the Roman Catholic Church, admitted the existence of discrepancies and inaccuracies both in the Old and the New Testament.

How, then, it will be asked, are we to distinguish between what is human and what is divine in the Bible. The author thinks that the principle by which this distinction may be made, is to be found in the purified reason. All valuable moral teaching addresses itself to the consciousness of those to whom it speaks; and this is pre-eminently true of the Bible. It can only be seen, like the sun, by its own light. In the words of Dr. Dorner, "Scripture can only be understood by a kindred mind. That which is necessary to salvation is intelligible to all who are spiritually disposed. The believer is the instrument which Scripture creates for itself by which to interpret itself." Until "spiritual insight" is received, nothing can be discerned which takes hold of the spirit, or influences character. Without this, belief is only an opinion.

In regard to miracles, the author seems inclined to the doctrine of F. W. Newman, in opposition to those who, like Mausel, insist upon a historical foundation for belief, namely that the quality of the teaching proves the miracle instead of the miracle the quality of the teaching. Such is the substance and tenor of the views presented in this volume. The style is clear and sometimes strong; and the candid and manly tone in which the entire subject is dealt with, in every aspect in which it is considered, is worthy of all admiration. Several of the aspects, however, in which it presents itself to many thoughtful minds, are either quite overlooked, or less satisfactorily treated than could be desired, and there is still room for another and a more complete and thorough discussion of the same important and interesting questions.

The Champagne Country. By Robert Tomes. 12 mo., pp. 231. New York: Hurd & Houghton. San Francisco: A. Roman & Co.

This is not a general book of European travel, but is devoted, as its name implies, to the champagne district of which the ancient city of Rheims is the great commercial and industrial center. It abounds in information which will be new to a great majority of readers, imparted in a peculiarly racy and agreeable manner. All who are interested in obtaining a thorough knowledge of the seductive beverage which derives its name from the descriptive title bestowed upon the flat country about the Rheims, and of the immense trade to which it has given rise, will do well to peruse this volume, which is rich both in sober statistics, and in sparkling gossip relating to the subject. As a specimen of its lighter vein, we give the author's piquant description of the business-like and thorough manner in which an English traveler set about the task of testing the wines of the district:

"A stout John Bull, of capacious stomach and full purse, alighting one day at the Lion d'Or, asked if Rheims was the place where champagne was made, and asked nothing else. On being answered in the affirmative, he immediately pushed for the dining-room, where he took up the wine-card and began business. Pointing to the long lists of the different brands of champagne, he ordered the first. Having received and drank this, he sent for the second, then for the third, and so on until he was so drunk he could neither drink nor order any more. The waiter now, as he had been previously directed by the eccentric Englishman, made a mark on the wine list with a pencil to indicate the point to which the force of swallow of the capacious guest had brought him. On the next day, at an early hour, the Englishman resumed his day's work, beginning where he had left off, and drank bottle after bottle; until he could drink no more. The waiter again made his mak: and once more on the third day, the Englishman, having partly slept off during the night, the effects of the wine, came to his work with renewed vigor. He did as he had done before, and this time finished the list, but was borne off insensible to bed. Next morning he was prepared to continue his labors, but finding by inspection of the wine-card that his work was done, he expressed himself perfectly satisfied, paid his bill, and took the first train for Paris. He had drank twelve bottles champagne in three days, during which time he had not left the hotel, and hardly the dining room, and departed from Rheims without having put a foot in its streets."

The volume consists in nearly equal parts, of gossip and anecdote in the vein of the above, and of practical information concerning the wine, and the traffic in it.

PAINS AND PENALTIES OF MUSIC.

DEAR READER, have you an ear for music? If so, drop this immediately—for we have nothing in common. I have no patience with those self-assured individuals who, from some real or pretended superiority of tympanum, are continually wedging themselves above their betters, in the good opinion of the world. From such I can only expect the contemptuous pity that sinks one several fathoms in his own self-respect. But to you, "my friend and fellow sufferer," I appeal—you who have felt the passionate love of music in your soul; a mighty force that could almost burst forth in streams of melody, and yet so firmly locked and ice-bound, that you are incapable of producing a single harmonious sound. In this "poor human race" there may be many like the Angels Israfel, "whose heart-strings are a lute," but unlike his their music dies echoless and unheard.

"The man who has no music in his soul
Is fit for treason," etc., etc.; but the words of the great poet are not enough for the present advancing stage of civilization. Music must ripple in the voice, and ooze from the finger tips, else you are banished a barbarian by gentility.

Like most young ladies—I have been musically educated—had the choice been left with myself, I should doubtless have taken the chances on the bliss of ignorance—but guardians and tutors are not so merciful, no matter how alien may be the taste and inclination. No young lady, now-a-days, is "finished," unless, with the rest of her numerous (and useless) accomplishments, she has "taken music." I follow back the thread of years till it becomes knotted and snarled, and I pause in a confusion of crochets and quavers. It is useless to dwell on the weary nights, in which the pigmy demons with "black heads" and "white heads, one hook and four hooks," danced and tumbled over the coverlet in inexhaustible confusion; how they tripped on ledger lines—and how they bound me down with "double bass," in fiendish exultation—I think my childish brain must have been in a state bordering on madness—I had a vague idea of an uncertain place where I should, some day, find rest (a "whole rest," I had almost said, but the subject is too ghastly to admit the shadow of a jest), but as my knowledge of books and the world increased, visions of a celestial city, in which golden harps and singing angels are so conspicuous, filled me with new doubts and uneasiness. Veni, vidi, vici—I have at length reached a proficiency that enables me to bang at popular operas, and ——I live at a musical house!

From my room, when twilight creeps in, the hour that should be sacred to quiet or thought, I hear four young men "with ears," pouring forth the woes of their sighing hearts and disordered livers, respectively on the guitar, violin, or flute. Four young men nightly return from the Academy of Music, singing or whistling operatic "gems" in such a diabolical manner, that I wonder the shades of Donezitti and Bellini do not appear with their veritable batons to belabor the offenders.

Musical soirees, are "all the rage;" at certain times (the exact antipodes of those angelic visitations we often hear mentioned,) our little parlor is the scene of these select gatherings. I seek the friendly embrace of some protecting armchair, retire into a fortress of window curtain with "Lallah Rookh," and am comparatively——happy. Short-lived beatitude! My name is pronounced, a hum of voices announces the approach of the enemy, my stronghold is ruthlessly invaded; I am dragged forth, a victim to the slaughter. Any resistance, on the part of the captured, is regarded as affectation or downright ill-breeding, (I wonder if any lady ever thought it rude thus to insist and persist, against all laws of common decency.) The piano-stool is reached; my trembling hands rush off at a John Gilpin pace—chords reel and stagger like drunken men, the perspiration stands in beads upon my forehead, the very keys mock my misery, and seem convulsed with discordant laughter at the bare idea of my guiding them into anything like harmony—during all this time the sense of hearing is becoming painfully acute: the lady at the end of the piazza taps her foot impatiently, there is whispering and smothered laughter across the room.

"Away went Gilpin, neck or naught;" the blood is bounding through every vein—a few more stammering notes—the finale crash—and a sigh of relief, echoed by——everybody; the friendly chair and curtain are reached again. Some one, with more boldness or less regard of veracity than the rest (the record of which crime I believe, will be blotted out), exclaims "Very nice!" Another flutter. "Will Miss B— favor us?" "Certainly," Miss B— despises all such trifling affectations. (It is an old saying that "comparisons are odious," I believe it), there is music in the very rustle of her soft silk, as she—no not walks—floats to the piano. A low tremulous vibration, like the sighing of leaves before a summer shower—a deeper wave—that almost wafts the cool wind to your face—and then—the welcome shower falls. Now the white fingers trip over the keys like a troop of fairies—hither and thither, dripping melody everywhere, and diamonds glitter and flash out a myriad rainbows. No whispering or tittering now—indeed, I am beginning to look for signs of suffocation in my friends, when the enchantress ceases, and they breathe again.

Not long since a new member was added to "our circle." I think I may truly say, he is the most thoroughly musical person I ever met with, and I do not yet understand the unfortunate circumstance that metamorphosed him into a human being. He is a highly intellectual looking gentleman possessed of "polished door-knobs"—much in the style of that philanthropic youth in "Bleak House"—with a lofty brow extending somewhere to the region of the organ of philoprogenitiveness. He always counts four in bed, and rises on the "down beat," his head is full of crotchets, and there is even a slight quaver in his voice. Notwithstanding all these infirmities of genius, I will confess that upon first acquaintance, I found my heart not altogether impervious to the darts of the wicked little god. We were reveling in all the delights of a silent wooing. We talked poetry, moonshine and music. He wore a bunch of faded violets in the vicinity of his left breast pocket, and I cherished a No. 7¾ glove in my top drawer. But alas! we couldn't run the gamut of true love any smoother than other folks. One memorable night, "From which the silken sleeps—were fretted out"—I mistook (oh awful to tell!) the Addio Leonora for "Old Dog Tray!" We met last night. I beheld the "door-knobs," the organ of philoprogenitiveness—above other heads—"proudly eminent," but no kind glance fell from those once soft eyes. We are strangers now. I fell asleep reading Burton's "Jealousy as a cause of Melancholy," and dreamed that Paradise was only to be reached by ascending a ladder of e strings, and the gateway was guarded by a flaming tuning fork.

San Francisco, July, 1867.

Californian Forethought.—Time was when Californians took no thought for the morrow, and were proverbially reckless in their expenditures. Now this is somewhat changed. Californians are settling down and saving money. They exercise considerable prudence also, in choosing a fit depository for their savings. They are not content that money brokers and bankers should use their money and give them nothing in return. Thus banking institutions paying interest on deposits have become popular. The Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Savings, in the Fireman's Fund Building, at the corner of Sansome and California streets, opened for the receipt of deposits on the first of July. Deposits will be received the same as in other banks, subject to withdrawal at any time; but the depositor will have the benefit of the accumulation of interest on all deposits, and in this consists the advantages the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank offers over other banks. A glance at the names of the Directors will give confidence to all of the stability of the institution; and the provident farmers, mechanics and workingmen generally, will gladly avail themselves of the advantages offered.

The Tribune commenting upon the subscription of $5,000 by the good people of Central City, Colorado, to be expended in bounties for Indian scalps "with the ears on," at the rate of $20 per scalp, says: "From all appearances Gen. Sherman will have to fight with a two-edged sword, and it may be questioned whether the white or the red savages are the more lawless and brutal." From the harshness of this comment, it would seem that Greeley is not a believer in Dr. Draper's theory that climate and location make men what they are, in spite of themselves. Otherwise, he might have accounted for the phenomenon of the men of Central City acting like savages, on the ground that they lived in a savage country.

We reprinted, last week, from All the Year Round, a touching tribute to the late Clarkson Stanfield, written by Charles Dickens. Mr. Stanfield in part illustrated some of Mr. Dickens' Christmas books, and was, for thirty years, a great friend of the novelist, for whose amateur performances at Tavistock House and elsewhere, he painted some of the scenery. It may not be generally known, says the London Review, that, in early life, Stanfield and Douglas Jerrold served on board the same ship, and that, having parted, they did not meet again for sixteen years, when they encountered on the stage of Drury Lane Theatre, on the first night of the production of Jerrold's "Rent Day."

The remarkably clever and sparkling sketch, in our present issue, entitled "The Pains and Penalties of Music," reads like a veritable experience, rather than a product of the fancy. Indeed, the vraisemblance is so strong, that we have no doubt many of our readers will have no difficulty in definitely locating the "musical circle," so graphically and gracefully described, or possibly, even in identifying the young enthusiast with the "door-knobby cerebral devlopment, in the region of his bump of philoprogenitiveness.

Benefit.—The benefit tendered to the First Hebrew Benevolent Society, by the members of the B'nia Berith Literary and Social Circle, will take place on Tuesday week, August 6th, at the Academy of Music. The Marble Heart, performed by the amateur members of the circle, will constitute the attraction.

BARBARA.

On the Sabbath day,
Through the churchyard old and gray;
Over the crisp and yellow leaves, I held my rustling way;
And amid the words of mercy, falling on my soul like balms,
'Mid the gorgeous storms of music—in the mellow organ-calms,
'Mid the upward streaming prayers, and the rich and solemn psalms.
I stood careless, Barbara.

My heart was otherwhere,
While the organ shook the air,
And the priest, with outspread hands, blessed the people with a prayer;
But when rising to go homeward, with a mild and saint-like shine
Gleamed a face of airy beauty with its heavenly eyes on mine—
Gleamed and vanished in a moment—O that face was surely thine
Out of heaven, Barbara!

O pallid, pallid face!
O earnest eyes of grace!
When last I saw thee, dearest, it was in another place.
You came running forth to meet me with my love-gift on your wrist;
The flutter of a long white dress, then all was lost in mist—
A purple stain of agony was on the mouth I kissed
That wild morning, Barbara.

I searched in my despair,
Sunny noon and midnight air;
I could not drive away the thought that you were lingering there.
O many and many a winter night I sat when you were gone.
My worn face buried in my hands, beside the fire alone,
Within the dripping churchyard, the rain splashing on your stone,
You were sleeping, Barbara.

'Mong angels do you think
Of the precious golden link
I clasped around your happy arm, while sitting by you brink?
Or when that night of gliding dance, of laughter and guitars,
Was emptied of its music, and we watched, through latticed bars,
The silent midnight heaven creeping o'er us with its stars,
Till the day broke, Barbara?

In the years I've changed,
Wild and far my heart hath ranged,
And many sins and errors now have been on me avenged;
But to you I have been faithful, whatsoever good I lacked;
I loved you, and above my life still hangs that love intact—
Your love the trembling rainbow, I the the reckless cataract—
Still I love you, Barbara.

Yet, love, I am unblest;
With many doubts oppress,
I wander like a desert wind, without a place of rest.
Could I but win you for an hour from off that starry shore,
The hunger of my soul were stilled, for Death has told you more
Than the melancholy world doth know; things deeper than all lore
You could teach me, Barbara.

In vain, in vain, in vain!
There droops upon the dreary hills a mournful fringe of rain;
The gloaming closes slowly round, lone winds are in the tree,
Round selfish shores forever moans the hurt and wounded sea,
There is no rest upon the earth, peace is with Death and thee,
Barbara!

ORIGINALITY.

A COMPLAINT is often heard at the present day, from the mouths of literary critics, that there is little or no originality in the world of letters. Poets are especially accused of having nothing to say that has not been better said before, and of serving up over and over again the bake meats of past times. The accusation is by no means confined to the case of poets. It is laid with less justice at the door of almost every school. Philosophers and historians, novelists and theologians, sculptors and painters, are all included in the same sweeping disparagement; and the ingenious analysts who dissect the current works of the age believe themselves able, in many cases, to pronounce upon the parentage and origin of the several ideas of which each work is composed. And some cynical people carry their belief in novelties so far as to assert, not merely that originality is rare, but it is almost impossible. The materials on which poetry in particular depends are, they say, limited, and cannot be multiplied indefinitely. The number, they think, of human passions is, after all, not so great; and the situations to which their play gives rise are to be counted on the fingers. Love returned and love unrequitted, jealousy and anger, pride and avarice, selfishness and generosity, go far to make up the tale. There is less variety in human nature than there is in the landscape scenery; and one impetuous lover, except for the difference in the color of his hair or the circumstances in the midst of which he is placed, is very like another.

Every faithless beauty is only an inappreciable variation upon Helen or Clytemnestra; all disappointed passion may borrow its language from Sappho, and after the narrative of Dido and Æneas every anecdote of seduction and treachery must be expected to be monotonous. Othello and Iago, Romeo and Juliet, make modern pictures of revenge, suspicion, and romantic affection dull and tame. Plautus and Terence are an epitome of all men and women ever since, only that the dresses and manners are archaic and antiquated; and there is nothing new in the world except perhaps the costumes of its inhabitants. Such critics are not therefore surprised at a want of originality, any more than they are surprised at the emptying of a mine whose treasures have already been dug up and used.

In discussing such a question it is desirable to be quite sure about the precise significance of words which one is employing constantly and freely, and "Originality" is a term frequently handled to and fro, but not altogether satisfactorily defined. Perhaps there is a little confusion of thought observable in the manner in which it is used. Occasionally it is applied to the mind of the producer; at other times to the literary result which he produces. In common parlance the writer is condemned as unoriginal whose creation reminds us of what we have seen before.

In the narrower sense of originality, it must be admitted that there is some monotony in the effect produced by many of the literary efforts of modern times. The monotony no doubt may be overrated. There has been a vast amount of life and variety in the literature both of England and of other countries in the last eighty years. No one, for example, can maintain that Mr. Carlyle's books, apart from any question of Mr. Carlyle's genius, are not in themselves novel and startling. Society has not been accustomed to have such writings presented to it, and was partly charmed, and still more astonished and confounded, when it saw them first. What is true of Mr. Carlyle is true in a less degree of others. The method in which history has been treated by Niebuhr Grote, Buckle, and Macaulay—to take four widely dissimilar instances—has nothing trite or effete about it.

Passing from history to romance we find again, that in the novel a new class of work has risen into existence, marked by immense vigor and full of living interest. They are indicative of a peculiar kind of mental power, which neither wholly imagination nor wholly observation, but something half way between the two. There is nothing monotonous about Sir Walter Scott, or Balzac, or Mr. Thackeray, or Mr. Dickens. It is not, however, in such a description of literature that poverty of invention would naturally show itself. Novels are not, as we have said, made up of mere imagination. They are mainly composed of description, though humor and imagination exercise an important influence upon the selection and arrangement of such incidents of daily life and of such types of contemporary manners as the artist determines to portray.

If poverty of invention is really a disease with which the age is stricken, we should rather look to find its traces in the species of literature which depends more directly upon imaginative force. And when we turn to poetry, there does seem to be some ground for the assertion that original thought is on the wane. No sacred poem of a modern date bears marks of the strength and sublimity that attract us in Milton. Shakspeare of course may be treated as a phenomenon with whom it is unfair to contrast the luminaries of any single generation. But independently of Shakspeare the earlier English drama has no rival. The lyric contemporaries of whom we are justly proud emulate their predecessors both in melody of verse and purity of sentiment, but are not their superiors in power. Even in comedy we have not of late years equalled Sheridan, any more than Sheridan himself was the equal of Molière. Meanwhile the mass of the poetry writers of the day are infected by an epidemic plague of imitation. They display their talents chiefly in reproducing the rhythms, the sentiments, and the mannerisms of others. They are always exploring Parnassus to pick up what bygone explorers have left behind, but they cannot be said to plant the sacred hill with any fresh laurels of their own.

The charge that has been made against modern poetical literature would seem capable of application to nine-tenths of the whole poetical literature of the world. There has been few poets who have not laid themselves open to it. We talk of Moliere, but Moliere is only Plautus in a French court-mask. His humor, his plots, his characters shine with a very borrowed light. We praise the English dramatists, but without the classical drama the English drama would never have existed, at all events in its present shape. No poet is fuller of plagiarisms, or, to use a more polite expression, of adaptions, than Milton. Without the shepherds of Theocritus, and of his imitator Virgil, the pastoral romances of Europe and of the Elizabethan era would have been unknown. Pope owes his form, and something of his raciness, to Ovid, to Horace, and to Juvenal. And, however far back we carry the investigation, the same result strikes us everywhere. Virgil and Horace pride themselves, not on having invented, but on having transplanted from elsewhere the thoughts for which they have been famous. Thus the golden chain of imitators has no end and no beginning. Go back as far as we may, we find scholars and students, and not teachers or originators. The very artists whom we regard as pre-eminently classical, seem, when we touch them, to be only a composite rechauffé of certain artists still. Literature consists rather of the learning than of the inventions of the past; and the end of all research lands the student in the natural conviction that most things which have been well said were said very long ago, and have been repeated with varied success ever since, in thousands of volumes hid away in the dust of a hundred shelves.

For Surgeons.—A Frenchman has invented a new paper which instantly stops the hemorrhage caused by wounds.

SIZE AND COST OF THE GREAT PYRAMID.

THE Great Pyramid originally occupied an area equal to 588,939,595 feet, or almost thirteen and a half English acres, the side of the square being 767,424 feet. The original height of this structure was 479 feet, and the total contents of solid masonry equal to 89,418,806 cubic feet, weighing 6,878,369 tuns. Taking the masonry at only twenty-five cents a cubic foot, including carriage, materials, and workmanship, the cost of such a structure would be $22.354,700. Again the masonery of the Great Pyramid would be sufficient for the erection of over 1,000 columns, each twenty feet square and of the height of the Bunker Hill monument; or if cut into paving stones four inches in thickness, would cover a space equal to 6,158 acres.

The blocks of which this great work is composed are roughly squared, but built in regular courses, varying from two feet two inches to four feet ten inches in thickness, the joints being properly broken throughout. The stone used for casing the exterior, and for the lining of the chambers and passages, was obtained from the Gebel Mokattam, on the Arabian side of the Valley of the Nile. It is a compact limestone, called by geologists "swine-stone," or "stink-stone," from emitting, when struck, a fetid odor, whereas the rocks on the Lybian side of the valley, where the pyramids stand, are of a loose, granulated texture, abounding with marine fossils, and consequently unfit for fine work, and liable to decay. The mortar used for casing and for lining of the passages was composed entirely of lime; but that in the body of the pyramid was compounded of ground red brick, gravel, Nile earth and crushed granite, or of calcareous stone and lime, and in some places a grout or liquid mortar of desert sand and gravel has been used. It is worthy of especial notice, that the joints of casing-stones, which were discovered at the base of the northern front, as also in the passages, are so fine as to be scarcely perceptible. The casing-stones, roughly cut to the required angle, were built in horizontal layers, corresponding with the courses of the pyramid itself, and afterward finished as to their outer surface, according to the usual practice of the ancients. In order to insure the stability of the superstructure, the rock was leveled to a flat bed, and part of the rock was stopped up in horizontal beds, agreeing in thickness with courses of the artificial work.

Without an Enemy.—Heaven help the man who imagines he can dodge enemies by trying to please everybody. If such even succeeded we should be glad of it—not that we believe in a man going through the world trying to find beams to knock his head against, disputing every man's opinion, fighting and elbowing and crowding all who differ with him. That, again, is another extreme. Other people have a right to their opinion; so have you. Don't fall into the error of supposing that they will respect you less for maintaining it, or respect you more for turning your coat every day to match the color of theirs. Wear your own colors, in spite of wind and weather, storms or sunshine. It costs the vascillating and irresolute ten times the trouble to wind and shuffle and twist that it does honest, manly independence to stand its ground.

Electricity Applied to Ringing of Bells.—In the London and Paris hotels, the bells are not rung by mechanical force, but by the pressing of a small button in the wall; this connected by an electric wire with a little alarm, the clapper of which keeps on jingling so long as the button is pressed. Lift the hand and the alarm ceases. This principle a French jeweler has adapted to cravat pins. The knob of the pin is of various devices. It is a hare with a tabor, or a drummer with his drum, or a death's head with a loose under jaw, or a dog. Whoever chooses to wear such a pin has connected with it by a wire a small electrical battery in one of his pockets. He puts his hand in his pocket, touches a button there and off goes the pin. The hare begins to patter on the tabor, the drummer to beat his drum, the death's head to chatter and roll its horrid eyes, or the dog to bark and snap. When the hand is lifted from the button instantly all is quiet.

A bashful young man escorted an equally bashful young lady. As they approached the dwelling of the damsel, she said entreatingly, "Jehiel, don't tell anybody you beaued me home." "Sary," said he, emphatically, "don't you mind; I'm as much ashamed of it as you are."

A Conductor of a newspaper, speaking of a contemporary, says, "He was formerly a member of Congress, but rapidly rose till he obtained a respectable position as an editor—a noble example of perseverance under depressing circumstances."

Mr. Quilp modestly asks why is the country in winter like the Black Crook? Because there are so many bare limbs to be seen.

It is rather remarkable that while several thousand feet are required to make one rood, a single foot, properly applied, is sufficient to make one civil.

Apology is egotism turned wrong side out. Generally, the first thing a man's companion knows of his shortcomings is from his apology.

MILLINERY AND HEAD-DRESSES.—Mrs. Winship has just received, per last steamer, the latest Parisian Millinery Goods and Laces for HEAD-DRESS, consisting in part of Breakfast Caps, Point Application, Lace Valenciumes, and the Widow's Rooche, worn by the crowa heads of Europe, and the only first imported to the Pacific Coast. Queen Emma, while here, replenished her wardrobe from the stock then and now on hand, at MRS. WINSHIP, No. 23 Post Street, under the Mechanics' Institute. Through the influence of Queen Emma, Mrs. Winship has filled quite a number of orders for the foreign population of Honolulu. The ladies of San Francisco should call and examine these beautiful Goods, by which means they will secure the Latest Fashionable Styles.

MAYER'S BAZAAR.—R. Mayer offers at his Bazaar, corner Pine and Montgomery streets, the greatest variety of jewelry, watches, silver plated ware, guitars, music boxes; concertinas, accordeons, opera glasses, etc., etc., to the public of San Francisco, and to the country trade, at prices that defy competition, and is determined to close out his present stock at greatly reduced rates. His heavy case silver watches from the American Watch Company are superior to anything ever before offered to the public. These watches are taking the place of heavy gold watches from the fact that the workmanship is superior, the castings pure silver, and the prices low. The sale of these watches is very extensive on the Pacific coast. Another proof that American manufactures can beat the world. The works are made of platina and never get out of repair. French opera glasses of great power for sale or hire, and all kinds of musical instruments, eight day family clocks, etc. This is a rare chance to invest your money to advantage, at Mayer's Bazaar, southeast corner of Montgomery and Pine streets.

N. B.—An immense assortment of Japanese curiosities for sale.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

THE YOUNG WIDOW.

She is cunning—sometimes witty,
Free and easy, but not bold;
Like an apple, ripe and mellow,
Not too young, and not too old;
Half-inviting, half-repellant
Now advancing, and now shy;
There is mischief in her laughter,
There is danger in her eye.

She has studied human nature;
She is schooled in every art,
She has taken her diploma,
As the mistress of the heart!
She can tell the very moment
When to sigh and when to smile!
Oh! a maid is sometimes charming,
But a widow all the while!

Are you sad? oh then how serious
Will her pretty face become!
You are angry; she is wretched,
Saddened, friendless, tearful, dumb.
Are you mirthful? how her laughter,
Silver-sounding, will ring out!
She can lure, and catch, and play you,
As an angler does a trout!

Ah! "old fossils," nearly fifty,
Who are plotting, deep and wise;
Ye "Adonises," of twenty,
With the love-light in your eyes!
You may practice all the lessons
Taught by Cupid since the fall;
But I know a little widow,
Who can win and fool you all!

A WITTY gentleman speaking of a friend who was prostrated by illness, remarked that "he could hardly recover, since his constitution was all gone."

"If his constitution is all gone," said a by-stander, "I do not see how he lives at all."

"Oh," responded the wag, "he lives on the by-laws."

"JEANNIE," said a venerable Cameronian to his daughter, who was asking his consent to accompany her urgent and favored suitor to the altar, "it is a very solemn thing to get married."

"I know it, father," replied the sensible damsel, "but it is a great deal solemner not to."

THE Democrats once held a grand rally and barbecue. An Irishman went to the Democratic leaders and said: "An' sure and didn't ye know better than to have a barbecue on Friday, when two-thirds of the party can't ate mate?"

AN Indiana paper says that ladies out here who wear number seven, eight and nine boots—and such are the majority—oppose the new short dress style.

JOSH BILLINGS' SLIVERS OF THOUGHT.—The heart ov a tru friend iz like a mirror: if you look into it you see yourself there.

Wisdom that dont make us happier aint worth plowing for.

It is a good plan to know menny people, but to let only a few know you.

I have no more respekt for those who cater to mi imaginashun, than I have for the man who first invented gingerpop.

I never knu a man ov mutch wisdum who could sing a song well, or pla on a fiddle.

I dont care how mutch a man talks, if he will only say it in a few words.

Rewards deferred makes us miserable; it iz jist so with punishments. When i was a boy i had rather be lickad twice than tew be postponed once.

I think it reduces the stummick ake to holle; so i think it lessens awl kinds ov anguish, jist az it does sin, by owning it.

We are awl willing tew pay more for being amused than instrukted.

How meny folks do you serpoze there iz in the world who are satisfied with things az far az they hav got? No more than 6, i'll bet. This looks rather dusty for the rest ov the trip.

There aint no general rule for happiness; a man haz to be measured for his happines, jist az he does for his boots, and even then he dont always get a good fit.

If a yung man kant find ennything else that he iz fit for, i like to see him carry a gold-headed cane.

The top rounds of a ladder are always the most dangerous.

I beleaf in the final salvashun ov men, but i want the privilege of picking the men.

There is just this difference between a success and a failure—quarter ov an inch.

It iz a great deal eazier tew beat natur than it iz tew equal her—so it is easier tew bile an egg tew much, than jist enuff.

IN a certain railroad depot is a placard announcing "No smoking," posted over an oil lamp. Two Irishmen appear, one smoking. "Pat," says the other, "ye're transgressin' the rules of the establishment, ye are." "How's that?" says the smoker. "Don't ye see there—no smoking?" "Yis; but can't ye see, ye spalpeen, the remark is addressed to the lamp?"

TRIUMPHANT!

At the Great UNION FAIR, held at Island Park, between Albany and Troy, in September, two Premiums were offered on Sewing Machines, one for the BEST and the other for the "Second Best"—competition being open to the State.

On the first day of the Fair, the Troy Agent of Florence Sewing Machine Company, having, jointly with the Albany Agent of the same Machine, entered it for competition, published in the Troy Daily Times a challenge to Agents of other Sewing Machines, to meet them at said Fair and compete with them for the Premium.

The challenge was accepted by the Troy and Albany Agents of the Willcox and Gibbs Machine.

Each party was to prepare and subject to the judges a "list" of the several "points of merit" on account of which "superiority" was claimed. These "points" were to he separately considered, thoroughly investigated and practically tested, by work done then and there, upon each of the machines; and then decided in favor of the machine which was adjudged to excel on that "point."

Finally it was agreed that the machine which, at the conclusion of the trial, should he found to have the greatest number of those "points" decided in its favor should he decided the "BEST SEWING MACHINE," and awarded the FIRST PREMIUM,

The result of the trial was, that the

WILLCOX & GIBBS WON THE VICTORY

and the prize, by the extraordinary superiority of thirty-five points, decided in its favor, against two points in favor of the Florence.

Full notes were taken of the trial.

It is a fact worthy of remark, that during the entire trial—which continued without intermission for nearly seven hours—not a stitch was missed, nor the thread once broken, nor a needle broken or bent, by the Willcox and Gibbs machine. No kind of work was attempted to be done on it that was not accomplished, and done in a perfect and workmanlike manner; and no effort was made on it that was not entirely successful; while neither of these statements can he truly made in favor of the Florence.

This remarkable trial can not fail, through the facts developed by it, to he productive of important results. It has raised the veil and exposed to public view the true character of the opposition, who will no longer he able to deceive the public by misrepresenting the character and merits of the Willcox and Gibbs machine.

It is an improvement on double thread machines; and its "stitch," which was severely tested by the Judges, was decided to he much stronger and less liable to rip in use or wear than the "Lock Stitch."

It is the simplest in construction—does the greatest variety of work—makes no noise—is not liable to get out of order—costs the least money, and gives the best satisfaction.

ADVERTISING BY THE ANCIENTS.—The Romans largely advertised private as well as public matters, and by writing as well as by word of mouth. They had their præcones, or criers, who not only had their public duties, but announced the time, place and conditions of sales, and cried things lost. Hawkers cried their own goods. Thus, Cicero speaks of one who cried figs: Cauneas clamitabat ("he cried out Figs!") But the Romans also advertised, in a stricter sense of the term, by writing. The bills were called libelli, and were used for advertisiug sales of estates, for absconding debtors, and for things lost or found. The advertisements were often written on tablets, which were affixed to pillars. On the wall of Pompeii have been discovered various advertisements. There will be a dedication, or formal opening of certain baths. The company attending are promised slaughter of wild beasts, athletic games, perfumed sprinkling, and awnings to keep off the sun. One other mode of public announcement employed by the Romans shold be mentioned, and that was by signs suspended, or painted on the walls. Thus, a suspended shield served as the sign of a tavern; and nuisances were prohibited by a painting of two sacred serpents.

IN Paris it is announced that the road-mending is done by steam rollers of abont 27 tuns weight, fine sifted gravel being plentifully scattered over the surface of the road metal, and the latter being broken small. The road-mending is generally carried on at night, and one may often find in the morning some 250 or 300 yards of fresh roadway made during the night, and smooth and fit for traffic.

TO THE UNFORTUNATE.

NEW REMEDIES! NEW REMEDIES!

Dr. Gibbon's Dispensary.

ESTABLISAED IN 1854,
616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco.

For the treatment of Sexual and Seminal Diseases, such as gonorrhœa, gleet, strictnre, syphilis in all its forms, seminal weakness, impotency, &c. Skin Diseases, (of years' standing,) and Ulcerated legs, successfully treated.

HORRIBLE DISEASES.

How many thousands of persons both male and female are there who are suffering out a miserable existence from the effects of secret indulgence, or from virus absorbed into the system. Look at their pallid, emaciated and disfigured faces, and their broken constitutions, disqualifying them for the happiness of marriage or the enjoyment of life. In this horrid situation thousands suffer until death closes the scene. Let parents, guardians and friends, attend to those who are suffering with any of these horrible, life-destroying maladies—see that they are cared for and cured before it be too late. Send them to Dr. Gibbon, a physician who has made private diseases his especial study for years, and who is certain to cure the most inveterate cases without mercury or any injurious drugs. It is important to those who are afflicted, to be careful of the many pretended Doctors who infest all cities, publishing their skill in curing all diseases in a few days, imposing upon the public by using the names of eminent physicians from Europe and other places. Be therefore careful and make strict inquiry, or you may fall into the hands of these charlatans.

Syphilis is syphilis the world over; so is small pox, consumption, and other diseases, to the contrary of what quacks may say.

SEMINAL WEAKNESS.

Seminal weakness the consequent of self abuse. This solitary vice, or depraved sexual indulgence, is practiced by the youth of both sexes to an almost unlimited extent, producing with unerring certainty the following train of morbid symptoms, unless combatted by scientific medical measure; sallow countenances, dark spots under the eyes, pain in the head, ringing in the ears, noise like the rustling of leaves and rattling of chariots, uneasiness about the loins, weakness of the limbs, confused vision, blunt intellect, loss of confidence, diffidence in approaching strangers, a dislike to form new acquaintances, a disposition to shun society, loss of memory, hectic flushes, pimples and various eruptions about the face, furred tongue, fetid breath, coughs, consumption, night sweats, monomania, and frequent insanity. If relief be not obtained, should apply immediately, either in person or by letter, and have a cure effected by his new and scientific mode of treating this complaint, which never fails of effecting a quick and radical cure. Dr. G. will give $100 to any person who will prove satisfactorily to him that he was cured by either of the San Francisco quacks.

Dr. Gibbon is responsible, and will give each patient a written instrument binding himself to effect a radical and permanent cure or make no charge.

Persons at a distance may be cured at home by addressing a letter to Dr. Gibbon, stating case, symptoms, length of time the disease has continued, and have medicine promptly forwarded, free from damage and curiosity, to any part of the country, with full and plain directions for use, for ten dollars, sent in a registered letter, or through Wells, Fargo & Co.

Address DR. J. F. GIBBON, 616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco, Postoffice Box 252.

CAUTION TO THE UNFORTUNATE.

Beware of the San Francisco quacks and pretenders who with bogus sworn-to certificates, dupe the unwary. Some of the self styled doctors whose names are to be found in all the daily and weekly papers of San Francisco and other places, are tradesmen, and become too lazy to work at their trade. Some are tinsmiths, shoemakers, newspaper carriers, intelligence offices keepers, etc. Look over the San Francisco City Directory and you will find their former occupation in it. Look at the Directory for 1862-63. The only way to avoid imposition is make inquiry—it will cost you nothing and may save you many regrets, for advertising physicians in eight cases out of ten are bogus, there is no safety in trusting any of them till you know who and what they are. Dr. Gibbon does not deceive people by exhibiting bogus titles, certificates, pretended patients' letters, etc. Dr. Gibbon will satisfy persons who may call at his office of his ability to treat diseases that he proposes to cure.

☞ Persons writing to Dr. Gibbon will Please state the name of the paper they see his advertisement in.

BABBITTONIAN,

OR SELF-TEACHING

PENMANSHIP!

The System of Babbitonian Penmanship is pre-eminently self-instructing. With its ample explanations of right and wrong forms—its sixty wood cuts—its plain intelligent rules, one may sit down by his own fireside and become a finer Penman than he could at much greater cost in the usual way with a living teacher.

There is a great demand for fine Penmen in the commercial world, and this system, at a trifling expense, imparts a skilful command of the Pen, worth hundreds of dollars to the fortunate possessor.

Penmanship is an indispensable accomplishment to Ladies, and this system is elaborate in a series of elegant copies in the Ladies' Style.

Business men have sometimes lost thousands of dollars from ignorance in regard to Business forms, and there is furnished in a set, without additional charge, a fine variety of Business Forms and Abbreviations. To sum up the Excellencies of this System, it is—

1—Scientific in its Arraugement of Principles;
2—Artistic in its Movements and Flourishes;
3—Practical in its Combinations and Applications;
4—Stylish in its neat and chaste Gracefulness;
5—Superior for Legibility, Rapidity and Beauty;
6—Most Disciplinary for fingers, Arms and Muscles.
7—Unexcelled for Comprehensiveness and Simplicity.
8—Complete and Self-Teaching for Private Learners;
9—Time, Labor and Expense Saving for Pupils and Teachers.

The Babbitonian Penmanship

Is published on durable card-board slips, ninety-two copies illustrated, put in a neat package with a Chart, the whole completo at the low price of $1 50.

Babbittonian Pens.

One reason why the country is flooded with poor Pens is that they are generally made by mechanics, rather than by artistic and experienced Penmen, the only parties really understanding the requirements of a good article.

The Babbittonian Pens,

Made in the most finished style, by skilful artisans, after models prepared according to the combined wisdom and experience of several amateurs and old Professors of Penmanship, are admirably adapted to meet the public wants.

The Babbittonian Ladies' Pen,

Is one of the most exquisite little instruments for delicate writing ever constructed.

The Babbittonian Extra Fine Pen,

Is pronounced by a large number of Penmen to be more free, more durable, and more varied in capacity for either fine or coarse strokes than any foreign Pen whatever. Suitable for elegant writing, it is a great favorite with the ladies and gentlemen.

The Babbittonian Business Pen,

Having great freedom and variety of movement, is unequaled for general business or school purposes. Somewhat coarser than the Extra Fine, it wears longer and moves more easily on paper.

☞ This Pen is now in use in the large countinghouses and banks in this city.

A RARE GEM OF ART.

"The Lord's Prayer,"

A pen drawing, by Mr. D. F. Brown, is one of the most remarkable works of art ever exhibited in this country. By patient labor he has succeeded in producing a design which for skill and beauty of execution, exquisite softness and delicacy of finish, and general merit, it would seem scarcely possible to surpass. The central figure—the face of our savior—is one of marvelous power and beauty. This and the faces of the Twelve Apostles, forming the border of the piece, are faithful copies from Leonardo da Vinci's famous painting of the

LAST SUPPER,

Re-producing, with the softest and most perfect shadings, the conceptions and characteristic expressions of the originals. Within this enclosure the words of the Lord's Prayer, in ornamental letters of various original designs and exquisite finish, are an interesting study of art in themselves; while appropriately distributed among these, miniture groups and scenes of marked events of Savior's life, copied from the great masters—five of them from Raphel's celebrated designs—form a harmonious completion of this unique, beautiful and truly wonderful work. The faces of

OUR LORD AND HIS APOSTLES.

Alone, so finely copied, would be a treasure in any house, and worth the full price of subscription.

AYER'S AGUE CURE,

FOR THE SPEEDY CURE OF

Intermittent Fever, or Fever and Ague, Remittent Fever, Dumb Ague, Periodical Headache, or Bilious Fevers, Indeed for the whole Class of Diseases originating in Biliary Derangement, Caused by the Malaria of Miasmatic Countries.

No one remedy is louder called for by the necessities of the American people than a sure and safe cure for Fever and Ague. Such we are now enabled to offer, with a perfect certainty that it will eradicate the disease, and with assurance founded on proof, that no harm can arise from its use in any quantity.

That which protects from or prevents this disorder must be of immense service in the communities where it prevails. Prevention is better than cure, for the patient escapes the risk which he must run in violent attacks of this baleful distemper. This "Cure" expels the miasmic poison of Fever and Ague from the system, and prevents the development of the disease, if taken on the first approach of the premonitary symptoms. It is not only the best remedy ever yet discovered for this class of complaints, but also the cheapest. The large quantity we supply for a dollar brings it within reach of every body, and in the bilious districts, where Fever and Ague prevails, everybody should have it and use it freely both for cure and prevention. A great superiority of this remedy over any other ever discovered for the speedy and certain cure of Intermittents is, that it contains no Quinine or mineral, consequently it produces no quinism or other injurious effects whatever upon the constitution. Those cured by it are left as healthy as if they had never had the disease.

Fever and Ague is not alone the consequence of the miasmatic poison. A great variety of disorders arise from its irritation, among which are Neuralgia, Rheumatism, Gout, Headache, Blindness, Toothache, Earache, Catarrh, Asthma, Palpitation, Painful Affection of the Spleen, Hysterics, Pain in the Bowels, Colic, Paralysis, and Derangement of the Stomach, all of which, when originating in this cause, put on the intermittent type, or become periodical. This "Cure" expels the poison from the blood, and consequently all alike.

Editors in Japan.

There are at present in San Francisco, eight Japanese, who came here by permission of the Japanese government, for the purpose of being instructed in the English language and the arts and sciences of America; two of them are retainers of princes.

The other day, Oa-da See-is-kee, and Ku-boomera Ju-ne-ski, accompanied by their interpreter, Forbes Maitland, Esq., paid us a visit. They could talk but little English, but Ku-boomera read a funny paragraph in the Lion's Mouth, with such good emphasis, laughed so heartily at the jokes (it was about the 10 tons of school books sent to Japan) that we immediately set him down as a most intelligent man. After examining the maps, engravings, and numerous curiosities in our gorgeous sanctum, our visitors took their leave. After leaving, Ku-boomera asked what position we held in the office. Mr. Maitland told him "writer," "editor." "Then," replied Ku-boomera, "he is an officer." "Oh no," said the interpreter. "But," persisted the Japanese seeker after knowledge, "you told me he wrote for the paper." "Yes." "Then he must be an officer."

The fact is, that none but a government officer is, in Japan, permitted to write for a newspaper. It was explained to Ku-boomera that this law was not in force in California. He expressed much surprise, saying: "What, anyone can write for a newspaper, here?" "Yes," replied Mr. Maitland "You can write for a newspaper?" "Yes, if I choose." "Then," said Ku-boomera, filled with a noble ambition, "I will write for a newspaper." We trust that he will carry out this resolution, and trust shortly to be able to present our readers with a series of papers from the pen of Kuboomera Ju-ne-ski. In the meanwhile, it would perhaps be as well for the Legislature of California to take a hint from the Japanese, and adopt some measures to check the alarmingly rapid increase of writers, in this State, where at present, every one who can read, write and spell, considers himself able to instruct the public, through the columns of a newspaper.

On Parties—By a Gloomy Wretch.

We have several times been asked to attend small parties. Friends we cannot do this thing, We dislike to refuse; it seems churlish and unsocial, but to sit in a room and be expected to be agreeable and say "somethiug" when there is nothiug to say, when the heart is down to zero, and the spirit won't move. O, we can't and we shan't and we won't. We prefer to bury our misanthropy in our own room, and amuse ourselves with our own ghosts and skeletons. Why should we take them out and air them in company? Why should we cast a gloom over the heart of any young female, deluded, perhaps, into the belief that she is to be entertained by us, haunting her with the grizzly phantoms of our vaporish moods. We dislike gloomy people, yet we ourself are a gloomy wretch. But we do not go about dumping our hypochoudriacism into everybody's lap. We will not be a torment to society if our phiz does carry shrouds, coffins and skull-bones in its expression. Not we. But don't ask us to parties if you would save your guests from the infection which pervades a gloomy wretch. Don't.

Our Sickness.

The sickness noticed last week as prevailing to such an alarming extent among THE CALIFORNIAN'S corps, is not entirely over yet. Nobody has died, however, a most fortunate occurrence as it is much less expensive to keep a dozen or two of us alive than decently to inter one. What's the use of dying at all, when one has nothing to leave behind them, save worn-out clothes and characters? No such good luck for us. There is said to be rest in the grave, and rest would be too good a boon for us.

City Gossip.

The homicidal and suicidal tendency, during the last week, has been remarkable. These things are epidemical Murders never come single. So with extensive conflagrations. Didn't you ever notice seasons when great fires prevailed in various cities and towns. The deliberation with which people commit suicide, now-a-days, is also worthy of notice. So many letters, directions, etc. They are even particular regarding the fashion of the weapon with which they propose to dispatch themselves They find amusement in exhibiting the rope, by which they intend to hang, to their friends. These peculiarities were shown us during the present week. It is awful, surprising, and curious.

The new market, between California and Pine streets, was opened on Wednesday night. Going through it, on Thursday morning, we saw the old faces of young and old market men, once common to Washington market, now behind their new stalls, chopping and cutting away at roast and sirloin as if no change had occurred.

But this is a world of changes, and the change most acceptable to us all is a little loose change. California street, is a peculiar thoroughfare. The lower portion is crowded with the temples of Mammon; further up the new market for sustaining the flesh; then comes the Alta establishment which has a place in the nourishment of the city's intellect and lastly we have Dr. Stone's Church and St. Mary's Cathedral—for our souls.

Gorham is in danger of being martyred by some of his ultra temperance friends, Did he treat that convention to those twenty baskets of champagne or not? Temperance in the use of stimulant is a good thing, a very good thing, but it does not embrace all the cardinal virtues. A non-whisky-drinking man can be a brute in the family circle and not half try. He can get into a foolish passion at an infinitesimal annoyance. He can lie and cheat and yet never touch a drop.

Creation, it is said, is always preceded by chaos. Merchant street now undergoing an extensive process of repair is an illustration of the truth of this maxim. Lumbered up as it is with piles of brick, dirt, boards, stone and mortar, it is a fearful place for the wandering and unsteady editor to be overtaken at nightfall.

Dr. Rowell is sounding the alarm bell. The cholera is coming. We must set our houses in order, lest we die. How about those who have'n't any houses? O, go to the alms house, the station house or the house of refuge. Dr. Rowell's advice is intended for respectable people, people of means, not mean people. Wonder where the Docter picked up that scriptual text?

How devious, and, indeed, quite past finding out are the ways of politicians. The Hon. J. G. McCallum belonged to the National Republicans, but it has been chronicled that on Monday evening, at seven o'clock, he was seen in front of Sime's Bank engaged in a peculiar whispering conversation with George Gorham. the skillful, astute, fearful George, and then he didn't attend the ratification meeting of those whose caputs are aching, which took place an hour afterward. What a political Rarey our George is. He merely whispers in their ears, and leads them afterwards without bridle or halter—by the nose.

What a jolly trio is that just now stumping the state, Gorham, Pixley, and Cox, Cox, pastor of a Methodist Church in this city. It is a queer mixture of politics, law and divinity!

We have been studying juvenile domestic training for a few days past from our window, which over-looks a number of back yards, generally tenanted by children os various ages and all sorts of tempers. At least once an hour, a peculiarly sharp sound and a vigorous squalling give evidence that condign punishment is being somewhere inflicted by an enraged parent. The children loose their tempers first, and the parents afterward. This brings the parent lower than the child. When will those donated with offspring learn to govern their own tempers. and by this means govern those of their children?

The "Times" Correspondent Behind the Times.

That wonderful individual, "the correspondent of the London Times" is supposed to know all past history, and certainly to be well posted on the events and fashions of the day. The Times' correspondent at Paris is a mole, a dormouse, a Rip Van Winkle. Speaking of the English princes at a ball, he says:

"They both had a rosebud in a button-hole, the freshness of which throughout the evening is, I understand attributable to a new and ingenious tailor's contrivance, by means of which the rose stalk is placed in a little vial of water hidden in a pocket made expressly for it.

"They both had a rose in a button-hole" is not good English. The Times should teach its correspondent to write "each had a rose in a button-hole." The whole paragraph is ungrammatical, but let that pass. This "new and ingenious tailor's contrivance" was invented, and has been in vogue in London for ten years past. This we know, although we are unable to give the name of the "new and ingenious tailor" who invented it. The Times is, by some persons, supposed to be infallible. it is therefore worth while to point out such stupid blunders. This correspondent is a lively sort of bird to send to Paris to examine the new inventions in the Exposition.

The Conscientious Reporter.

Gorham draws. It is evident he draws the Bulletin after him, for they must have sent a reporter, and a conscientious one at that, to look after the smart little man at Placerville. It is the aim of the Bulletin to be exact and just, not extravagantly abusive like the Democratic journals. Relative to the applause with which Gorham was greeted at Placerville, the conscientious reporter says first, "when he alighted from his buggy (at Placerville), there was not an attempt to cheer until he was on the sidewalk, when some one called for three cheers, which was answered by half a dozen people." You see three cheers were called for, which was answerd by six people, which was half a cheer per man. When introduced at the meeting, the conscientious reporter says, "he was treated to considerable but not extravagant applause." This is drawing the lines very fine. Again at the close, we are informed that it was evident he had made a favorable impression on the people by the increased heartiness of the cheers, but it was far from an enthusiastic reception, even allowing for "the difference between applause in the open air and applause in a building." This is treating the science of applause in a scientific and philosophical manner. The conscientious reporter shows great investigation and minuteness. They "discharged a small cannon," not a big one, for Gorham. The platform contained "fifteen plank seats, each capable of holding twelve persons." When Conness commenced, there were 180 men seated, 450 to 480 standing, and 250 at the verandahs and windows. This closeness is intended to counteract against the statement, made by some mischievous telegraph operator, who said that the "greatest enthusiasm prevailed, and that there were at least 1800 or 2000 people present. Yet says our conscientious man, "We must say the meeting was a very large one for a town of 2000 population, men, women and children, and where a great number of the inhabitants come under the latter head." That man has a conscience, and it is to be believed that even now he is suffering agonies for fear of having done Gorham some slight injustice, or of not having told the exact truth about the quantity of applause, and the number of people present.

The Cartes de Visite Dodge.

When Miss Adah Isaacs Menken was performing in this city she realized a considerable sum from the sale of her cartes de visite representing her in various stages of nudity. It is now quite the fashion for actresses to have their likenesses sold in the theatres in which they are performing. We notice that "Dr. J. P. Bryant, the healer," who cures all diseases by stroking and pawing his patients, has taken a hint from this. The following advertisement appears in the Banner of Progress:

"CARTES DE VISITE of DR. BRYANT may be obtained at this office—price twenty-five cents."

We fear that those cartes will not go off as fast at twenty five cents each as did Menken's. To increase the sale we would suggest that "the Healer" advertise that neuralgia will be infallibly cured if the patient sleeps with one of these likenesses under his pillow, and that lumbago will in like manner be cured by applying one to the afflicted part.

The Enrolling Clerk of the Ninth Ward.

This gentleman has been complained of in a prominent evening journal for asking applicants such impertinent questions as the following: "Do you work every day?" Are you married?" Now, we being no voter or registered citizen, and what is more, never expecting to be one, consider this quite correct. If a man be married he ought to work every day—or he has no business to be married. This enrolling clerk is evidently a conscientious man who wants to do his duty to his country and the gentler and more deserving sex. But he is not understood or comprehended.

Big Gun.

The Bulletin incurred the trouble and expense of sending a "special reporter" to Placerville, to report Gorham's speech. The reporter was a careful and conscientious man. He evidently wanted to discharge his duty to the paper that paid his expenses, without compromising his honest convictions. In his anxiety not to represent Gorham as "a great gun," he was very particular to state that the piece of ordnance which they discharged in his honor, was "a small cannon."

The Long Room.

The "Long Room" in the New Merchant's Exchange, is an apartment devoted to transactions in brokerage, and is so called because the character of the business carried on therein requires long pockets, and often causes long faces.

Infamous Conundrums.

Why is a rhinoceros like a mosquito? Because you cannot kill either of them with a revolver.

Why is an aching corn like a giant? Because they are both heavy on the feet.

HOW LAFITTE'S TREASURE WAS FOUND.

BY A. W. DILLARD, OF ALABAMA.

FROM the dawn of recollection I was a most devout believer in dreams, and this feeling has exerted a most potent influence on my life. Even at the tender age of ten, my belief in dreams was deeply rooted and firmly fixed in my mind. My father, a really intelligent and observing man, had a deep repugnance to every kind of superstition, and he regarded a belief in dreams as pre-eminently superstitious. He argued with me often on this topic; and, although I was unable to refute his arguments, my mind never wavered for a moment. Finding his logical thunders had failed to shake my belief, he changed his tactics and assailed me with ridicule and banter sufficient to have demolished half the savans of the Sorbonne. I felt the sting and the smart of these pungent attacks, yet my belief in dreams knew no abatement.

I read with avidity every book I could procure touching this theme. I made it a point to search out all works on the subject. I was soon conversant with all that had been written on dreams; more especially with such books as were devoted to the interpretations of those visions of sleep. My friends often twitted me about my hobby; but, though he gave me many a fall, wherein I received various bruises, I continued to ride him. The more giddy of my friends, of both sexes, amused themselves by writing out their dreams and sending them to me for interpretation, and I have now on hand many of these manuscripts, which I once thought of editing.

If Pharoah, Belshazzar, etc., had dreams which were verified, why also should not my dreams come to pass? I could not give any vivid reason against my theory, consequently I adhered to it "through evil and good report" with what some of my friends styled obstinacy, and another class whispered was downright folly.

My heir apparent—I am a bachelor—a wild, rollicking, harum-scarum fellow, who seemed never likely to grow weary of "sowing his wild oats," and was no sooner out of one scrape than he plunged pellmell into another, having run short of cash, hit upon a brilliant plan for replenishing his empty pockets. It was no less than an attempt to prove me to be non compos mentis, and to secure the position of guardian for himself. The matter was solemnly investigated in court, and excited a profound interest in the community. My whole life, even from childhood, was laid bare to the jeering lawyers and the gaping crowd, with a freedom that outraged every feeling of delicacy. Every giddy word ever uttered by me—every blunder ever committed by me, was mercilessly dragged before the court. The truth is, I scarcely recognized myself in the person thus presented to the court, and was half tempted to believe that it was a dream. My life-long belief in dreams was the "trump card" in the hands of my prosecutors, and they rung all their changes upon it. Physicians were examined by the dozens, but hardly any two concurred; their uncouth technicalities and hard words caused me to stop my ears to keep out so horrid a din, and even this act was lugged in by the ears by the lawyers to prove my mental unsoundness. And so greatly were the phosibians incensed at this contempt for their technicalities, that I verily believe, had they been re-examined, they would for once have agreed, and have pronounced me hopelessly deranged.

The lawyers opened the case, and pelted me till I was sore from head to foot. I was satirized, ridiculed, laughed at; I was excoriated, mangled, and torn; my poor hobby was kicked cuffed and pummeled until it could hardly keep its legs; my trades were arraigned, and represented as blunders into which no sane man would ever have fallen—my whole life was painted in colors more applicable to a demon than to a quiet citizen. Old Dunderhead surpassed all his previous efforts at the bar, and rioted in vituperation.

Luckily for me, the jury was composed of sensible men, and they decided I was sane. On hearing the verdict, old Dunderhead spitefully declared, lunatic asylums ought to be abolished and the men confined in them ought to be made professors in our colleges. There is no end to his venom.

Being disgusted with these proceedings, I determined to pass the next six months in traveling, and having made my will, by which the kinsman who had dragged me before the court and subjected me to the fierce vituperation of Dunderhead was disinherited, I set out on my travels.

While in New Orleans awaiting a St. Louis boat, I had a most singular dream. It ran as follows: I was walking along in a meditative mood on the island of Barataria, the former rendezvous of the noted Lafitte, when I was startled by the sudden appearance in a few feet of me of a venerable looking man attired within a sailor's dress. He saluted me politely, and informed me that if I followed his directions strictly he could put me in possession of immense wealth.

I readily promised to obey him, and besought him to proceed with his disclosures. He directed me to go at low tide to the extreme eastern point of the Island of Barataria, measure six hundred and ten yards from thence in a due west course; then to run three hundred yards, due north, and make this the center of a paralellogram twenty-five feet long. I was then to search in the southwest corner for the end of a spar, and dig down to the depth of ten feet for the hidden treasure, which consisted of Spanish doubloons, bullion and jewels of all kinds. As soon as he had imparted this information to me, he vanished from sight so quickly as to leave me in doubt whether he had not sunk into the ground

I found it impossible to get this dream out of mind.

By day and by night it haunted me. It could hardly be said to be out of my mind a moment during the day. Now, I had not thought of Barataria or Lafitte for many years. I had never read but very little concerning either, and that little had been read in boyhood I had never been near the island, nor conversed with any one that had visited it. Why, then, had I dreamed about them? I was not at all intoxicated—indeed, I had not touched a drop of alcoholic or vinous liquor; nor was I delirious from fever. What subtle cause had occasioned this dream? I felt sure it was not caused by nightmare. My health was unusually good, my digestion was excellent, my mind was free from al perturbation, and my supper had consisted of a cup of tea and a cracker. It was in vain that I endeavored to account for this. But, strange and inexplicable as it was, the dream was engraven on my mind—burned into my memory, and nothing could remove it.

One night, just after the boat had passed Memphis, I had precisely the same dream. In every particular—the starting point—the distances—the directions—the spar sunk in the ground—the parallelogram—the corner—the features, voice, and dress of the old man, it was the same as my former dream. The old man looked like one I had known for years.

If the first dream had sorely puzzled me, this last one bewildered and astonished me. Why did I dream two dreams exactly alike in the minutest particular? I could not account for it.

I reached St. Louis, and determined to remain there a couple of weeks. The third night succeeding my arrival, I retired to bed at an early hour. My health was robust, and my mind undisturbed by care and trouble of any kind, as my life-long rule had been never to borrow trouble—never to take any care of business to bed with me. Very soon I fell into a sweet and refreshing slumber. The same dream flitted through my mind. It was in all respects identical, with the exception that everything appeared far more plainly to me than on the former occasions.

Why had this dream come to me three different times? Could it be devoid of all meaning and significance? If it was only a vagary of sleep—the illusion of an over-active imagination released from the control of reason—why had I dreamed the same dream so often? Now, some of the cardinal canons in the interpretation of dreams is, that where we have the same dream three different times, it is bound to be true.

I now began to attach considerable importance to my dream, and to reflect upon it in all seriousness. Finally, I regarded it as being full of truth and significance, as the communication of some one from the spirit land; and so deeply was I impressed with this idea, that I returned to New Orleans on the first boat.

My first business on reaching it was to charter a schooner in which to visit the Island of Barataria, and my next to purchase all the books relating to Lafitte or the island, and to ascertain, from the oldest inhabitants, all they knew on this subject. I would have been pronounced a monomaniac, so intently did I meditate on this topic. So keen and vivid was my recollection of the philipic of old Dunderhead, that I used every precaution to prevent all suspicion of my purposes. I supplied myself with a compass and tape line and sailed for Barataria. On reaching it I went ashore, and directed the boat to pull back to the shoonor and return for me at the end of four hours.

I was aglow with excitement, yet full of trust, hope and faith. Reaching the extreme eastern point of the island, I measured off six hundred and ten yards, in a due west course, using every imaginable point to attain complete exactitude, both in the direction and measurement. Prior to sailing I had carefully ascertained the variations of the compass between 1810 and 1860, by experiment, as well as conversation with surveyors. I was satisfied with the correctness of the first time. I then proceeded to run three hundred yards due north, and made the point reached the center of a parallelogram, twenty-five feet long, agreeably to the directions given by the man who appeared to me in my dream. My next step was the ascertainment of the southwest corner of the parallelogram I had laid off with labored precision. I removed the sand with my hands, to the depth of six inches, from a space of about six feet square, and, lo! there was the end of the spar! I became so nervous that I was forced to sit down for some minutes. Thus far my dream had been realized In three most important particulars it had been certainly verified; the distance of six hundred and ten yards due west, and of three hundred yards due north, had proved correct, and the finding of the spar at the southwest corner of the parallelogram, demonstrated the truth of my dream up to this point.

Having none of the implements for excavating to the depth of ten feet, and being, moreover, physically unable to perform the manual labor involved in such a task, I returned to the place appointed for the long boat to meet me, and rowed back to the schooner. I returned to New Orleans, and after a stay of only a few hours, I started for my home.

It was now absolutely necessary that I should procure the assistance of at least two reliable men in order to complete my search for hidden treasure. I selected two gentlemen, whom I had known from boyhood, but on broaching the subject to them in a guarded manner, and soliciting their aid, they gave way to a violent fit of laughter, and then earnestly besought me to relinquish so absurd a project, and also reminded me what ridicule and derision I had already drawn on myself by my superstitious belief in dreams. This unlooked for repulse from two of my most attached friends, whom I wished to share in my treasures, was intensely mortifying to my feelings, but it utterly failed to shake my faith in my dream.

I was more successful with the next two, whom I sounded, as I agreed to defray all expenses, and to give them jointly one-third of all the treasure discovered. I spoke of the matter with so much coolness and plausibility, dwelt on the complete verification of my dream up to a certain point with so much pertinacity, and dilated on the untold wealth in store for us with so much rhetorical richness, that I succeeded in infusing into them a part of my own sanguine and undoubting faith.

The necessary preparations were pushed forward with such energy that everything was in readiness at the end of a week. We proceeded to New Orleans and chartered a schooner. We purchased and sent aboard a block and tackle for hoisting the treasure, three wheelbarrows for transporting it to the beach, spades, shovels and pickaxes, together with very strong boxes, for the more effectual security of the treasure.

I was now primful of the affair. My appetite failed me entirely—sleep set at defiance all my wooings. I was nervous, restless and abstracted. I felt, like Napoleon must have felt at Waterloo, on which he staked his fortunes. This expedition would either turn the laugh against such as had diverted themselves by heaping ridicule and derision on me, or confirm the belief, generally entertained, that I was a monomaniac. I can say with perfect conscientiousness that my course was not prompted by covetousness; as I had already more money than nine men out of a thousand possess, and, indeed, had lost, as much more without one pang of regret. No, my motive was far higher and nobler. It was to demonstrate the truth of dreams and to vindicate my own character.

We reached the island, and hastened to the spot where I found the spar on the former occasion. My companions gave way to the most extravagant joy on beholding the spar, which bore traces of having been buried for many years. We at once set to digging, and worked with a will. The sand was loose and our progress was rapid. When a depth of ten feet had been reached, our spades struck against something hard, and when the sand was cleared away we beheld three large chests such as sailors use on shipboard. We hastily opened them with palpitating hearts and tremulous hands. The chests contained Spanish doubloons, bars of gold and silver, diamonds, pearls, rubies, gold crucifixes, gold images of the Saviour and many of the saints, breastpins, bracelets, ear rings and shoe buckles, with a few medals, on which were engraven curious hieroglyphics, which proved them to have belonged to the Aztecs.

My companions were almost frantic with joy, they tossed their hats up in the air, they danced, they shouted, they laughed, they wept, they hugged me, they embraced each other, and, in short, they were violently extravagant, so wildly joyous that I apprehended they might lose their senses and frustrate all my plans.

For my part, I was entirely happy and perfectly contented. I was no longer a monomaniac. I was no longer a target for the envenomed shafts of satirists and witlings; my dream had been completely and brilliantly verified. Language is too tame to describe my joy, my triumph and my happiness at this result, yet I indulged in no extravagant display of my feelings.

The treasure was placed in the boxes that we had brought with us, and wheeled down to the beach, and carried on board of the schooner. We postponed the division, until we should have reached New Orleans, as we feared to excite the cupidity of the captain and crew, by a display of so much treasure.

A fair division was made as soon as we arrived at New Orleans. My companions were extremely happy, as they were now enormously rich. The doubloons that fell to my share amounted $3,495,236, and my share of the bullion and jewelry amounted to at least $1,000,000 more. Upon making a careful examination of the jewelry, I lighted upon a large gold watch which, from the engraving, seemed to have been presented by the burghers of Ghent to Charles V. in the year——, and a handsome medal presented by Louis XIV. to Iberville, as the inscription declared. I appropriated these precious relics of antiquity and now own them.

I returned to my home, loaded with wealth, yet I took little pleasure in it. I invited a large company to my house to dinner and exposed my treasure to them, at the same time informing them how and where it had been discovered. At my request my companions did the same thing. This was tangible and palpable proof of the truth of my dream, and the most skeptical were reduced to sileoce by the sight of my treasure. I procured from my compaoions the following certificate, which I puolished in the New Orleans Delta of July 20, 1860:

B——, Miss., July 10, 1860.

Mr. Charles Lucas, Sir: At your request we hand you the following statement: On the 9th May ultimo, you stated to us that you had dreamed three times that by starting at the extreme eastern end of the Islaod of Barataria, measuring thence 610 yards, in a due west course, thence 300 yards due north, aod making this the center of a parallelogram 25 feet long, and digging io the southwest corner, around a ship's spar, to the depth of 10 feet, you would find an immense treasure. You also stated that you had visited the island, run out the distances, aod fonod the spar. At your request we visited the islaod in your company and discovered the treasure precisely in the spot and maoner foretold in your dream. We have received the share promised us, aod invite all who doubt our truth to call and see for themselves.

JOHN A. SINCLAIR,
THOMAS W. WILSON.

Sworn to and subscribed before me July 10, 1860.

Edward Graham, J. P.

I also published the followiog certificate from my two friends, who had refused to assist me:

B——, Miss., July 10, 1860.

Dear Sir: In reply to your note we beg leave to state that about the 1st of last May you informed us that you had dreamed, on three different occasions, where a large treasnre was buried on the Island of Barataria, and that you had verified your dream in part by a visit to the spot. You urged us to accompany you on an expedition to Barataria and aid you in digging for this treasure, but we only laughed at you. We have seen and handled your treasure, and are satisfied you discovered it in Barataria. Many of the doubloons were coined in the reigns of Philip II and his successor.

Yours, etc., BEN. F. ROGERS,
JAMES THOMPSON.

These publications turned the tide of popnlar feeling in my favnr, and I was now as much lauded as I had formerly been ridiculed. My affectionate relative grew very solicitous to renew friendly relations with me, but my resentment for his former unkindness caused me to repel all his advances toward reconciliation, as well as to signify to him my determination to disinherit him. I carried old Dunderhead home with me by main force, and exhibited to him all my treasures to him, assuring him I owed it all to a "dream." He looked both envious and crestfallen, but has since treated me with marked respect. For several weeks Duoderhead was observed to take long walks alone, and he was at length detected in digging for hidden treasure on a knoll on which the Indians had formerly lived.

I have endeavored to make a proper use of my wealth. As I coosider it is only a loan from Providence, I am resolved to bestow it during my life upon deserving objects. I am now educating one hundred young men, whom I selected on account of their display of native talent, and I often reflect what an immense service I may render the human race by this system. It is my purpose to maintain the same system doring life. I have already saved several hundred worthy men from failure and ruin by a little timely assistance. I have furnished one hundred honest and industrious young men with sufficient capital to start them in business on a small scale.

These sums are loaned to them for five years, without interest; and I feel certain of being able to do a vast amount of good by this system of loans. Would to heaven the Astors, Stewarts, Lawrences, Vanderbilts, Laws and Jeromes, could be induced to adopt the same plan, instead of bestowing donations on colleges, etc., by last will and testament.

[The abnve pages were deposited with me by my friend (Mr. Lucas) with instructions not to publish it until after his death. That lamentable event occurred on the 15th April, 1867, at 2¼ o'clock, P. M. His estate was appraised at $500,000; he appointed all who owed him any money his trustees, and directed them to continue the same system of loans, and at their death to appoint all—then owing these loans—trustees of the same fund.—Editor.]

European Ingenuity.—The New York Evening Post has the annexed in this connection:

The old world is trying its best to keep up with the new in industrial inventions, and the Paris Exhibition affords a fine field for ingenuity to display the results of its talent and perseverance. There is a machine in operation there at present, from Wurtemburg, for making paper from wood, which is said to be the most extensive apparatus in the whole Exposition. A tree, cut into convenient blocks, is put in at the top of the mountain of continuous and gradually descending rollers and grinders, and comes out quite rapidly at your feet in the shape of a fine, white, soft, pulp, ready to be pressed into any form of paper desired. A machine accomplishing the same result in a somewhat different manner, as far as may be judged from the above vague description of a Paris letter writer, has been in practical operation for some months—a year or more—in this country. Indeed, there are several factories here where paper is made from woody fiber, aud a number of the daily and weekly papers use it exclusively. Whether the Wurtemburgers have a just title to the original idea is uncertain. The French were trying a number of similar experiments some years ago, but with what final success we do not know. But, at all events, the German machine, as described above, is ahead of any other yet invented in simplicity of methnd and vastness of result. It reminds the writer of the celebrated "mutton mill," by which, putting a live ram in at the top, you were in a few moments presented at the bottom of the apparatus with all the "best cuts" of mutton, ready dressed, together with an elegant pair of carved powder horns, a flask of neatsfoot oil, a keg of bone dust, a finely finished dozen of sheep's wool stockiogs, and a pair of sheepskin breeches of approved pattern and make.

"DON'T STAY LONG."

A LOOK of yearning tenderness
Beneath her lashes lies,
And hopes and love unutterable
Are shadowed in her eyes,
As in some deep nnruffled stream
Are clouds and Summer skies.

She passed to early womanhood,
From dreamy, sweet girl life.
And crossed the rosy threshold but
To find herself a wife;
Oh! gently should he lead her steps
Along the path of life!

And as she clasped her small white hands
Upon his arms so strong,
How often, like a summer sigh,
Or a sweet pleading song,
She whispers, with a parting kiss,
"Beloved one, don't stay lnng."

It's almost always on her lips,
Her gentlest parting words,
Sweet as the fragrance from rose leaves
When by soft zephyrs stirred,
And lingering in the memory,
Like songs of summer birds.

And in his heart they nestle warm,
When other scenes amid;
He stays not till she weary grows,
And her fond eyes are hid
In tears, which lie in bitterness
Beneath each veiling lid.

And oh, how many hearts are kept
By that love-nttering song!
There's scarcely one who on life's waves
Is swiftly borne along,
Bnt what has heard from some dear lips
Those sweet words—"Don't stay long."

GREAT LION FIGHT IN ENGLAND.

BATING THE KING OF THE FOREST.

IT had been more than two centuries since a lion fight had taken place in England; the encounter in the reign of James I, when mastiffs were matched against a lion for the entertainment of the court, haviog been the last exhibition of this kind. Some naturalists there were who altogether lost sight of the inhumanity of the spectacle, in the ardor of their desire to know the relative degree of superiority possessed by the lion over the mastiff and bull dog.

The most celebrated of Wombwell's lions was Nero, a tame and inoffensive creature, though of great stature and majestic appearance; and it was this aoimal that was reported to have been matched by Wombwell against six dogs. He was whelped in the capital of Scotland, and had been brought up tame as a lap dog. Wallace, another of Wombwell's lions, was a smaller, but a much more savage aod formidable animal.

By many it was supposed that the reported net of five thousaud pouuds, said to have been made by Wombwell, was a fabrication, and little donbts of this was afterward entertained. As the day of the fight approached, public excitement became extreme; humanity was more urgent io its appeal; and indignation louder in its thunders. Private individuals used their influence to dissuade Wombwell from his purpose, and the press redoubled its importunity and condemnation; but the lion-owner was obdurate to entreaty and reproach.

The place fixed upon for the fight was a hollow square enclosure in the snburbs of Warwick, on the road to Northampton, called "the old Factory Yard." Two sides of this hollow square were occupied by the empty workshops of the old factory, many stories high, the windows of which were fitted up and furnished with seats, and the other two sides were filled up with caravans of wild beasts. The cage formed of iron bars, in which the combat was to take place, stood in the middle of the enclosnre. It was about fifteen feet square, aod ten high, with room between the bars for the dogs to run in and out, while the floor of it was elevated as much as four or five feet from the ground.

Wombwell's expectations of profit must havo been unreasomable, for the charges at first demanded were—half a guinea for standing places, seats at remote windows, a guinea; fourth floor seats, twn guineas; and seats on the first, second and third floors, three guioeas each. These prices, however, could not be sustained. Whether it was that the disgust which the announcement of the fight had called forth, or some other cause, had operated to prevent many from being present who would willingly have attended, certain it is that the gathering fell far short of what had been anticipated. Too many there were present, but not enough to be an encouragement to sn barbarous an enterprise.

A fit sort of prelude to the iohnman spectacle which was about to take place occurred on the night before the combat, for eight dogs intended to be opposed to the lion, having been placed together by their bntal guardian, instead of being kept asnnder, their natural ferocity produced a general fight, in which one dog was killed outright, aod another lost an ear and a part of his cheek. Their keeper said it was not his fault, but the dogs'; for they "didn't ought to quarrel," being "all on the same side."

During the morning of the day on which the combat was to take place, the dogs that were to fight were made a show of at the "Green Dragoo," at an admittance price of sixpeoce. In the caravans round the yard, besides the lion Nero, the hero of the day, were three other lions, a lioness, a she-wolf with cubs, two leopards with cubs, a white bear, a hyena, two zebras, wild assess, monkeys, and a multitude of other ceatures. Nero lay quiet in his caravan, looking unconcernedly at the preparation making for his own annoyance.

Wombwell's trumpeters, arrayed in gaudy colors and mounted on horses, were sent forth through the streets of Warwick, Leamiogton, aod the villages near, to announce the coming fight. Seven o'clock in the evening was the hour fixed for the cammencemeot of the combat. Accommodations were made for a thousand people to witness the fight, and about five hundred attended. The money taken may be roundly stated to be £400, and the expenses were about £100. The £300 profit were but a miserable indemnity for so much inhumanity, sin, and disgrace.

Of the six dogs which were to fight, Turk and Tiger were brown; Captain, fallow aod white; Rose, skewbald; Nettie, brindle, with a black head; and Nelson, white, with brindled spots. Many had foretold that the lion Nero was too tame to fight, aod this proved to be correct. Nero having entered the iron cage from his own caravan, all was at length ready for the cruel combat; the lion himself seemed to be the only creature unconscious of what was about to take place. The spectators both above and below had their eyes riveted on the cage. There crouched Nero, king of the brute creation; there near the cage, waited the inhuman handlers of the dogs; and there stood, licking their black lips, and struggling to be let loose, the mastiff bull-dogs, thirsting for the forest monarch's blood.

Captain, Tiger and Turk were first slipped at the lion, who by some was expected to seize and shake and tear them, as a terrier dog does a rat which he has caught on a barn floor. Nothiog of the kind took place, however; Nern permitted all the dogs to seize him—iodeed, he seemed not to understand how to protect himself from his tormentors, who bit, and mauled, and pulled at him at their pleasure. Had he been a lamb instead of a lion, he could hardly have acted a tamer part. After a time, he shook off the dogs at once; but even then he did not attempt to hurt them, but kept flying about the cage, endeavoring to make his escape.

It was a miserable and disgusting sight to see the dogs hanging to the lips of the agonized aoimal, seizing him by the under jaw, and pinning him by the nose; the lion roaring with pain, but not enraged. Several times, he tore off the dogs with his claws, but never once used his formidable teeth. Captain, the fallow-colored dog, was at last taken away, lamed and much distressed; and Tiger and Turk continued to fight. next crawled out of the cage dreadfully maimed, leaving Turk alone. This dog the lightest of the three, though wonnded and bleeding from all parts of his body, still contended with the lion, which was twenty times his weight, pinning him by the nose at least a dozen times over. When Turk was withdrawn from the cage, mangled and bleeding, he seemed more dead than alive, and it was some time before he exhibited any symptoms of life.

Duriog the twenty minutes' respite that followed, poor Nero (after being sluiced with a pail of water by Wombwell, who at once went into his cage) rubbed his wounded head with his paws, like a cat; he then lapped for some time from a fresh pan of water, and was patted and caressed by a keeper, through the bars of the cage. The savage throng being now impatient for a renewal of the combat, three fresh dogs, larger than the others—Nelson, Rose and Nettie—were let loose.

The cage had been rendered slippery by the water thrown dowu, so that the poor lion, partly exhausted, could not keep his feet when attacked by the three dogs. They fastened upon him at once, while he, as before, only tried to get away from them. When the dogs were taken away, the people cried out for them to be brought again to the fight, as they were not beaten. The dogs were again brought forward, and the same heart-sickening scenes of cruelty prevailed. At length the strife was ended; the dogs, wounded and maimed, and the lion, torn and bleeding, were separated. The first fight lasted eleven minutes, and the last five; aod this, by the merciless assembly, was called "sport" aud "pastime."

In spite of the disgust and indignation called forth in the public mind by this inhuman spectacle, dnring the same week in which it occurred, a second lion fight was announced by Wombwell, who seemed bent on acquiring a lasting reputation for inhumanity. He matched his lion Wallace, cubbed in Scotland, against six of the best dogs that could be found. Wallace had much the ferocity of a forest lion; he was put into the same cage in which Nero had been so cruelly baited. Spectators were admitted to the Old Factory Yard at five shillings a head, and several well dressed women viewed the contest from the factory windows.

Three couples of dogs were slipped at Wallace—Tinker, Ball, Sweep, Turpin, Billy and Tiger—one couple at a time; but Wallace made quick work of them, he clapped his paw upon Ball, took Tinker in his teeth, walking about with him like a cat with a mouse. Turpin and Sweep were treated in much the same manner, and Tiger aod Billy had no better success. Turpin ran away, Sweep was half killed; Tiger made his escape just in time; and Billy, said to be the best dog in England, was wounded iu the head, and severely maimed. If in the former bait the dogs had the better of the lioo, in the latter the lion had the mastery over the dogs. Both combats, however, were equally discreditable, and called forth the most unsparing reprobation.

LITERARY GLEANINGS.

THE RITUALISTIC CONTROVERSY.

NOTWITHSTANDING the "declaration" of the twenty-eight bishops, the advocates of ritualism, at the East, do not seem to be at all abashed or discouraged. On the contrary, not content with with maintaining the defensive, they have assumed an aggressive attitude. charging the "twenty-eight" with being "busybodies in other men;' matters" when they remonstrated against usages which do not obtain in their own dioceses. And, in fact, this charge does not seem to be altogether without foundation, when we remember that the Bishop of the diocese in which the usages complained of were practised, was on the spot to interfere himself, in case he should deem it wise and proper to do so.

This remonstrance, however, against the ceremonial introduced into one of the churches of New York, has elicited a pamphlet, entitled, "Conversations on Ritualism," in which the whole subject is discussed, betwcen a rector and one of his parishioners, the former being didactic and a little dogmatic, after the manner of the average rector, and the latter being rather more wooden headed, we should hope, than the average parishioner.

Concerning the weight to be attached to the remonstrance. the two converse as follows:

PAR.—Surely, they must have forgotten themselves; but will you tell me what importance is to be attached to this declaration?

REC.—It has no authority whatever. It has no canonical weight. It is not law, neither is it any interpretation of law.

PAR.—You surprise me. Pray explain your meaning more fully.

REC.—The only way in which our bishops can act except as the Ordinaries of their respective dioceses, is in their united corporate, collegiatc character as a House of Bishops. Even here they can only express their opinions: they cannot define the doctrines or make laws. The laws or canons of the Church can only be made by the General Convention, and you know that the House of Bishops is only one part of the General Convention. This declaration of the 'Twenty-eight,' is not the action of the law-makiwg power of the Church: neither is it an authoritive expression of opioion on the subject of which it treats. It is simply a declaration of the individual opinions of the signers. So far as the secret history of it is known, it lacks the dignity which their concurrent action would have given to it, for it seems to have gone circulating around the coun'ry, begging for signers, and failing to secure the names of some of those who are confessedly the most learned of our prelates.

PAR.—What weight then should it have with those who wish to be informed upon this matter?

REC.—Simply so much as would be given to the opiuions of as many other men; and the value of their opinions would be measured by their knowledge of the subject. It is pretty well understood that but few of our bishops or clergy are well informed with regard to Ritualism, it not having entered very largely into the course of their theological studies; and the low. loose, and irregular usages tolerated in some of their dioceses, show that their practice is on the same level with their learning.

PAR.—Well, I am greatly relieved. I was really fearful that some terrible evil was impending over the Church; but it seems to me that the greatest evil is that so many of our bishops could be found who would forget the bounds of their Episcopal authority.

The parishioner's concluding slur at "the Bishops," seems to be quite characteristic of the ritualist mind, which is not particularly reverent, so far at least as persons are concerued. In regard to the charge that ritualism has any affinity with "Popery," the conversation is as follows:

REC.—Alas for poor human nature! I went through all this ordeal many years ago, and now I pay no attention to the silly clamor. I have lived long enough to see much improvement in the order of the Church's worship, and to see many things which twenty years since were rated at as Popish, now very generally acccpted, I remember when a friend of mine was building a church, the good people begged him not to put a cross on it; he did it, however, and now almost every church has a cross within or without. Even St. George's Church' the pet of Dr. Tyng, has its two stone spires surmounted with the symbol of Redemption. You remember what an outcry was made a few years ago about preaching in the surplice; now it is very common and excites no remarks. Fifteen year since the introductiou of flowers at Easter was horribly Popish; now it is a very general custom, and even Dr. Butler, in his 'Ritualism of law,' 'does not despise but relish God's own emblems of the flowers at Easter with the greenery of Christmas.' I might go on and give you many instances of this kind, but some experience in this direction will teach one to be somewhat indifferent to this weak and contemptible cry. No! let people once understand that Popery does not consist in Ritual beauty and reverent solemnities in the worship of God, but that it has deep, dark, and damning characters which are its real marks, and we will not be troubled with this idle clamor.

PAR.—What do you understand by Popery?

REC.—I will read you a short paragraph which I have just met with which will answer your question (Reads): "'Popery,' or modern Romanism, really consists in certain modern departures from ancient Catholic practice; and those additions to the ancient faith, by synodically adopting which at the Council of Trent the Church of Rome has virtually separated itself from the rest of the Catholic Church, (which requires as necessary to be believed for salvation only the ancient creeds of the universal Church.) These 'additions' to the faith and other errors are such as—The 'cultus' of the Blessed Virgin; adoration of the cross, images, and relics; forbidding its clergy to marry; doctrine of purgatory; that the Church of Rome is the mother and mistress of all churches; obedience due from all churches to the Patriarch of Rome, who of late centuries has styled himself 'the Pope' or 'Papa' as though there were no other in Christendom—the fact being that in early Christian days all Bishops were called, by a term of endearment, 'Papas;' denial of the cup to the laity, and Transubstantiation; the doctrine of supererogatory merits; the doctrines of Papal pardons, indulgences, and dispensations; affirming the Apocrypha to be inspired Scripture; the interdiction of the reading of the Bible, except by special permission. In such 'particular points' as these the Church of Rome 'is fallen from itself in its ancient puriety,' as declares the 30th English canon of 1603. Such errors as these we 'forsook and rejected' at the Reformation, but not the Church of Rome itself, or any other branch of the Catholic Church, as the same Canon emphatically declares. The present separation of the Roman from the English Church was the act of the then Roman Patriarch himself in the 11th year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. I have thus explained what the English Church declares to be 'Popery.'—not from any unchristian feeling toward Roman Catholics, but in self-defense against misrepreseutation.'

PAR.—You consider then that Popery consists in doctrinal and practical corruptious of Catholic Christianity, and not in the mere fact of a beautiful and seemly order of worship.

REC.—Exactly so: of course there may be a Romish Ritual; there may be a Ritual which sets forth and symbolizes the peculiarities of the Papacy, just as there may be a Ritual which symbolizes and sets forth the peculiarities of Presbyterianism or Quakerism, and I should strenuously oppose the introduction of either into our Church. What we want is a Ritual which is appropriate to our position as a true branch of the One Catholic and Apostolic Church, which enables us to worship God in 'the beauty of holiness;' which symbolizes the great Catholic truths we hold in common with the rest of Catholic Christendom; but which rejects every addition, whether from Rome, Geneva, Oxford, Boston, New York, Baltimore, or Alexaudria. In one word, we want a Ritual which will be the outward and visible manifestation of our faith as Catholic Christians.

To those who feel interested in the discussion, the publication will prove acceptable. It can be procured at Roman & Co's.

A LITERARY CURIOSITY.

Nearly a year ago, we saw a strange poem, entitled "The Ghost at the Funeral," in the Poets' Corner of one of the San Francisco dailies—the Call to the best of our recollection —where it was credited to Longfellow. Sometime afterwards, a correspondent of THE CALIFORNIAN's addressed to us a communication inquiring in regard to the authorship of the poem, which we ackuowledged our inability to answer. A few days since, we were not a little surprised to find the same piece published in the New York Citizen of June 15th as as an original contribution to that paper, "By Millie W. Carpenter." There is some mystery about this, which requires to be cleared up. The poem is as follows.

THE GHOST AT THE FUNERAL.

The funeral pageant fills the aisles;
Slowly they come all robed in black,
Behind her coffined form, whose smiles
Drew my heart tortured to the rack,
In those sad years of mine when earth
Beside those smiles held little worth.

How brief the time now seems, since I
With shroud and pall was lying here,
And did they think that she could die,
And be entombed, and I not near?
I, who despite her rank and pride
Knelt for her love, and failed—and died!

A sunbeam from the narrow pane
Slants, and falls on the saintly face
That seems so like a child's again,
In snowy frame of flowers and lace;
While from the cold hands, shapely small,
The sweet tube-roses droop and fall.

How still she sleeps! ah, too much grace
To lie within the grave's restraint:
How calm the look and pure the face
That Raphael would have loved to paint,
Had she lived in those other years
When artists were of gods the peers.

The organist now takes his seat,—
The seat that I filled long ago—
And they a funernal strain repeat
That shakes the roof with sounds of woe.
The carved old saint upon the wall,
Seems ready on his knees to fall.

Nay, let me touch the keys once more;
My hand can draw forth mightier tones—
For all the zeal of years before
Has gathered fire within my bones,
To give voice now to this weird gloom,
And bid her welcome to her tomb.

Beneath his hands I touch the keys,
And sobs, and sighs, and tempest tears
Wail out, that make the warm blood freeze—
The outcry of my martyred years,
Nor dream they of the ghostly form
That rocks and bows beneath the storm.

Well may they wonder what new fire
Their organist to-day hath found,
That makes the half-affrighted choir
Tremble beneath the rush of sound,
The grand, bewildering burst of song,
Imprisoned in the tomb so long.

And half I fear and wonder lest
She rise, and come with stately tread
To bid me break no more her rest;
But no, they bear away their dead.
And while their sombre draperies wave
I'll creep back to my dusty grave.

"WAYSIDE FLOWERS."

We huve received from the authoress, Carrie Carlton ("Topsy Turvy,") a volume entitled "Wayside Flowers," a collection of all her earlier poems. The book has had an extensive sale in the Eastern States. It contains many poems of merit. It may be obtained by addressing "Carrie Carlton care of Roman & Co;" the price is $1.25. Had we space to spare, we should feel inclined to publish a poem entitled "The Conductor's story" as a favorable specimen, but must content ourselves and our readers with the following, which will give some idea of the merit of the work.

LITTLE FLOY.

Open wide the golden portals,
Swing the pearly gates afar;
Hail her coming with glad music,
Light up every twinkling star,
Lo! she comes, returning homeward,
Cherubs, wave your wings for joy—
Comes the little truant Angel,
Star-eyed, white-robed little Floy.

Downward on a mission went she,
With her playmate, gentle Spring;
Hand in hand they wandered earthward,
She with closely folded wing.
Earthly eyes with love were blinded,
Earthly hearts were filled with joy,
And they never knew, an Angel
Was the fairy, little Floy.

But the little feet grew weary,
Drooped their blossom day by day,
And with aching hearts they watched her,
Knowing well, she could not stay.
We can pity earthly sorrow,
But with us there's naught but joy,
Open wide the golden portals,
Welcome, welcome, little Floy.

Carrie Carlton, has, for some years past, been an active contributor to the literature of the Pacific Coast, and we trust that this, her earliest literary attempt, will meet with a ready sale among those who have read and admired her later productions.

DO I MISS YOU?

"DO you miss me the same love, oh! say that is true!"
Is asked in the poem dear Sadie from you,
But I know in the depths of your dear loving heart,
The question was answered ere it did depart.

Do I miss you? Ah love! What a question, but then
I know it comes but from the lips of your pen,
Those cold iron lips, with their ebony blood,
And not from your heart with its warm crimson flood,

Do I miss you? Ah me! Would my heart miss its blood,
My eyes miss the light should the sun cease to flood
The hill-tops, the valleys, the rivers, the plain,
And ne'er till the skies with glad sunshine again?

Do I miss thee? each second, each minute, each hour,
I miss thy sweet presence, thy magical power,
To calm my vexed spirit and make me forget
All else, save my love for my beautiful pet.

IMPROVEMENTS.—The Dry Goods firm, of Messrs. J. W. Davidson & Co., No. 19, Montgomery street, have been quietly at work for several weeks past, in making an extensive improvement in the business capacity of their store, by cutting through the partition which divides it from the fine store that fronts on Sutter street, one door above the Ladies' entrance to the Lick House, thus joining the two stores into one. The new addition has been fitted up with excelleut taste, and stocked with recent importations of the newest style goods, and choicest dress fabrics, purchased by Mr. J. W. Davidson, the senior partner, who is now in Europe, attending personally to the purchases of this house. With a new and splendid stock of dry goods, selected especially to meet the wants of the ladies of San Francisco, by one whose taste and experience in such matters, is unquestionable, and with enlarged business capacity, this old-established house now puts forth its claim to the title, not yet awarded, of being the Dry Goods House of San Francisco. Though that is a claim that the ladies and not the newspapers, must decide.

CALIFORNIA ROADS.—The roads of California are not the best in the world. In many parts of the State McAdam is unknown, and deep ruts try the strength of vehicles severely. Saul & McArron, manufacturers of stage and thorough-brace wagons, 579 and 681 Market street, turn out carriages, buggies, express, thorough-brace and stage wagons, which will last for years though driven over the roughest roads.

ABIDE YOUR TIME.—Messrs. Fitch & Little have fulfilled the above maxim by securing six months ago a snug place on Summer street adjoining the New Market. Their Liquors are the best this market can afford. They will be pleased to see their old friends and patrons. Entrance from Montgomery street, on Summer street, and the Market.

"STAPLETON'S."—Visitors to the California Market should by all means drop into "Stapleton's," next door. In this well arranged refreshment saloon they can find a capital lunch, a good cigar, and the finest wines, spirits and ales in San Francisco.

CALIFORNIA MARBLE.—California produces some of the most beautiful marble, in the world. Fine specimens of marble worked into counters, may be seen in the new market. These came from the well-known marble works of John Daniel, 421 Pine street.

THE SWEET HAVANA WEED.—Connoisseurs in cigars should call on Anthony Pargo in "Stapleton's" next door to the California Market There they can get a pure, fine-flavored Havana cigar.

CURES GUARANTEED TO THE SICK.—No medicine. Quick and pleasant. By Dr. Bonrno, 10 Masonic Temple, Post street.

ABOUT FISHING.

BY JOHN QUILL.

THIS thing of going a-fishing, you know, and calling it sport, is about played out. Old Isaac Walton was a decciver, and his Complete Angler is calculated to pervert public morals, and lead the unsuspecting astray. In my opinion, it's an over-rated book, and ought to be suppressed. It encourages the idea that fishing is a genteel pastimé, which affords time for meditation, and cultivates a love for the beautiful in nature. That this is all nonsense, every man knows who ever went a fishing in his life. I leave it to the sufferers if it ain't.

Don't you know that you go out and nearly burst a blood vessel digging worms for bait, and then you have to dig a hole as big as a rifle-pit before you can lay your hands on one solltary worm? Then when yon get to the water, you very likely sit down on some bush or other, and undergo nearly as much physical suffering as you do when you stick the fish-hook into your hide while you are trying to put the bait on.

When you ouce throw in, you begin to watch the cork, and you look at it hour after hour, until you nearly go blind, and you think you see about twenty corks, and as it never budges one inch all the time, you conclude that there ain't any fish about, until you pull up, when you find that some well balanced and insidious member of the finny tribe has sucked all the bait off.

After enough patient endurance to start eight or nine Christian martyrs in life, you get a nibble. Yes, the cork moves slightly, and you think you are at last going to get a fish. You watch it elosely, while your mind runs over the big fish you have heard of. You think of Jonah, of whaling voyages and of the sturgeons you have seen around in the markets. Perhaps this is one of the large size, and you wonder if you hadn't better go home and get a dray to fetch it. Suppose you were to catch the sea serpeut, or a thousand pound snapper? and you involuntarily suggest soup to yourself, while all the time the cork keeps bobbing up and down, until at last she gives one jerk and goes under. Got him, by George! Pull up, and there is a wretced little fish on the hook, that wouldn't satisfy the appetite of a sick sardine, and he cost you just fourteen worms, enough to bait a school of mackerel.

Throw in again, wait for an hour, and you don't get a single nibble.

Then you think you are safe, let go and light you pipe. No sooner do you get the match lit, and you can't throw it down, for it's the last one you've got, than you get a splendid bite: the cork goes clear out of sight, and before you have have a a chance to pick up the rod, the fish gets off.

Any man who says this isn't aggravating, onght to die; he ain't fit to associate with ordinary human beings.

But you try to encourage yourself by saying that while there's life there's hope, and that perseverance and patience overcome all things, and by getting off a lot more of old second-class lies, and throw in again. Wait for several centuries, if you calculate according to your sufferings, and never get any bites but one in the calf of your leg for some nine-legged spider who has been on an exploring expedition up your pantaloons.

Then yon pull out and spit on the bait for luck; maybe you blow on it if you are superstitions, and you throw in and get a bite. You pull up several hundred times, and never catch him.

Then yon get mad, you believe it is an eel, and yon swear to catch that eel or die. You feel that life will be perfectly joyless and destituto of happiness, unless you get a chance to put your grip onto that eel.

At last, you hook him and draw him out. He is active, and playful and vivacious. He is on the wiggle, and combines himself into letters S and C and X, and runs through the alphabet generally, and slaps you in the face, and gets around your leg and covers you all over with slime.

Then he tangles your line into a hard knot, and when you get your foot on him you find he has swallowed the hook, and just as likely as not you've got to rip that eel clear open from head to tail to get it out, and when you do he will wiggle away from you and annoy you as long as you stay there.

Eels never die; immortality is their stroug point, and they lay themselves out to make you abjectly miserable.

When yon get all straightened out and throw in again, you begin to ponder. Imagination comes to your aid, and you wonder why you can't have just the same luck as other men have, or as that man had down at Cape May, who went a fishing and pulled up a flounder, and he hadn't got him more than half way out before a sturgeon jumped up and swallowed him, so he kept jerking at the sturgeon, and was just about to lift him in when a shark happened to pass by, and stooped to take in the sturgeon at a gulp. So he canght them all three, and he said he dare say if there had been a whale anywhere in that vicinity he would have froze on to him also.

And so you wonder why you can't have the same partiality shown you as that man had; for you only get about one first-class bite during the day, and you pull up and you have an enormous fish, and before you get him near the shore he quietly lets go his hold and drops back into his native element. It is rough on you, I admit, but when you go a fishing you've got to take it as it comes without growling,

There is a kind of subdued melancholy about it; a regretful disappointment that is pleasant. How interesting it is when you have dropped the last one off, and you get another bite, to make up your mind to get this one anyhow, and then to concentrate all your strength and pull up with a violent jerk, and sling your line back on to a tree, and have it wind around the branches as tight as if it had been pulled by a steam engine, and in such a bewildering condition that you can't get it loose in a week.

This is calculated to make you use hard expressions, but not any more so than it is to have your cork drawn under gently and steadily, and go down, down, down, until it is out of sight. "A catfish, most probably," you say, "they always pull in that manner." You draw your line in gently, and the catty tugs at the other end. "They always do this," you observe. You pull up slowly so as to keep him on the hook, and when you get your line out, you most probably find an old snag with about a hundred branches and covered with mud, and nary a fish in the neighborhood, while all the time there is a boy with a fish hook and an old hank of twine who is catching them so fast that he can't bait his hook, and the ground is white with them all around him.

I don't advocate profane swearing; indeed I am down on it; but if there ever is an occasion when the ten commandments are temporarily suspended, this is it. A man is legally entitled to relieve his pent up feelings, and the more so, because when he gets up to go home he finds that his fish hook has caught him by the shirt, and that there is a puddle deep enough to float a canal boat just where he has been sitting.

Of course you can't go home without fish, to be laughed at so you go over and try to buy them of the boy, who not only tries to insult you by asking yon if you "ketched any?" but feels that he has you in his power, and makes you pay more money than you could buy out a whole oyster sloop for.

No, I don't see any sport in it, and if I wanted to make a man utterly wretched; if I wanted to hurt his feelings, and break down his spirits, and ruin his morals, I would get him to go a fishing about once a week. I approve of abolishing penitentiaries and jails, and making convicts fish for the benefit of the State.

A HUNDRED YEARS AGO.—One hundred years ago there was not a single white man in Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana or Illinois Territories. Then, what is now the most flourishing part of America, was as little known as the mountains of the moon. It was not until 1796 that the hunter of Kentucky, the gallant and adventurous Boone, left his home in North Carolina, to become the first settler of Kentucky. The pioneer of Ohio did not settle till twenty years afterward.

A hundred years ago Canada belonged to France, and the whole population of the United States did not exceed a million and a half. A hundred years ago the great Frederick of Prussia was performing those exploits which have made him immortal in military annals, and with his little monarchy was sustaining a single-handed contest with Russia, Austria and France, the three great Powers of Europe combined.

A hundred years ago, the United States was the most loyal people of the British Empire, and on the political horizon no speck indicated the struggle which, within a hundred years thereafter, established the greatest Republic in the world.

A hundred years ago, there were but four newspapers in the United States—with a combined circulation not exceeding two thousand. Steam engines and cylinder presses had not been imagined, and railroads and telegraphs had not entered the remotest conceptions of man.

DECLIVITY OF RIVERS.—A very slight declivity suffices to give the running motion to water. Three inches per mile, in a smooth, straight channel, gives a velocity of about three miles an hour. The Ganges, which gathers the waters of the Himalaya Mountains, the loftiest in the world, is, at 1,800 miles from its mouth, only about 800 feet above the level of the sea, and to fall these 800 feet in the long course the water requires more than a month. The great river Magdalena, in South America, running for 1,000 miles between two ridges of the Andes, falls only 500 feet in all that distance; above the commencement of the 1,000 miles, it is seen descending in rapids and cataracts from the mountains. The gigantic Rio de la Plata has so gentle a descent to the ocean that, in Paraguay, 1,500 miles from its mouth, large ships are seen which have sailed against the current all the way by the force of the wind alone—that is to say, which on the beautiful inclined plane of the stream, have been gradually lifted by the soft wind, and even against the current, to elevation greater than that of our loftiest spires.

ONE result of the war is said to be that Washington now contains nearly double the population it had in 1860, and that the public business done there is more than twice as large.

PREJUDICES are like rats, and a man's mind like a trap; they get in easily, and then perhaps can't get out at all.

THE PACIFIC MUSICAL GAZETTE.

WE have received the Pacific Musical Gazette for August. This is a highly interesting number, and reflects credit on its editor, James F. Swift. It contains four pages of music. Among the compositions is a quartette for male voices, entitled, "Am I Dreaming?" by Geo. T. Evans. The libretto of L'Africaine, is published in this issue, also a resumé of the musical events of last month, and well-written editorials. One of these contains a suggestion that we should be glad to see carried out. In order to do all we can to bring the matter prominently before the musical people of San Francisco, we transfer the article in question to our columns:

SHALL WE HAVE A CONSERVATORY.

So many circumstances combine to encourage the, perhaps erroneous, but very prevalent idea that San Francisco does not occupy a front rank in the list of great cities, that the proposition to establish a Conservatory of Music here will perhaps startle the timid, evoke doubts from the skeptical and excite the risibilities of those more mirthfully inclined. That the idea will be scouted by many, perhaps at first by a majority, of those who are presumed to take any interest in the subject can hardly be doubted. Such, at least, has been the experience of many cities in the Eastern States where simlar enterprises have, notwithstanding, proved eminetly successful With a full knowledge of the risk we incur of meeting with all kinds of objections, we nevertheless entertain a profound conviction that such a project is not only feasible, but that it would be attended with more than moderate success.

Assuming the importance of musical culture, it follows that we ought not to remain satisfied with that merely superficial taste which is a reproach to our so called musical circles. That the noble art, at present, is cultivated merely as an amusement, without regard to those higher esthetical laws which constitute its great charm and beauty, is too apparent, both in our social circles and the public places of amusement. So far from ignoring the sevices of our resident professors, we only echo the sentiments of many of them when we state that private tuition is altogether inadequate to produce the desired results. They believe with Mendelssohn that "An institution such as the Conservatory, whose object is to give its pupils an opportunity of making themselves thoroughly acquainted with all those branches of study, the knowledge of which is necessary and indispensable to the educated Musician, and to educate them theoretically and practically in the same, has this advantage over the private instruction of the individual, that by the participation of several in the same lessons and in the same studies, a true musical feeling is awakened and kept fresh among the pupils; that it promotes industry and spurs on to emulation; and that it is a preservative against one-sidedness of education and taste—a tendency against which every artist, even in the student years, should be upon his guard.

That such an institution must be established here, sooner or later, is evident, when we consider the peculiar circumstances of our geographical position. San Francisco is, in a far wider sense, the metropolis of the Pacific coast, than are many older communities in other localities, which claim to be the centers of material prosperity and of cultivated ideas. A conservatory, once established here, would attract pupils not only from the city but from all those adjacent and many distant points which pay tribute to us as a mercantile emporium. We have also an abundance of teachers fully capable of presiding over the different departments, and could easily name, were it necessary, those who are eminently fitted to instruct the various classes, which would include elemcutary instruction, vocal and instrumental, composition, instrumentation, notation, the formation of the voice and a normal department;

We are so fully convinced of the feasibility of such an enterprise, that we intend to agitate the subject until it is brought to a practical test. Meanwhile, who will undertake the delicate task of uniting the principal teachers of the city and secure their co-operation in an undertaking, which will not only contribute to a better knowledge of the art, but which will, at the same time, be a source of profit to themselves?"

M. PROSPER MERIMEE, in a recent article, after exhibiting the advantages of society in the eighteenth century possessed over contemporary French society, adds: "But I think the most fatal blow our drawing-rooms received was given by luxury, which was unknown to our fathers. The parties and suppers which were formerly so gay, were but a pretext for conversation. Now-a-days people rarely open house except to have numerous witnesses of the expense indulged in them. The drawing-rooms are crowded, nobody talks, few dance; people are suffocated in the dining-room, but what a display of flower and silver, and what light a giorno! The Duke de Pasquier said to me, 'Nothing could be more modest than our suppers in the olden time; we had a few candles, two substantial dishes, and rarely more than one sort of wine; but on the the hand conversation was general, each one tried to pay his share by amusing the others, nobody tried to astound by his wealth and everybody tried to please.'"

ILLUSTRATIVE.—A French journal says: "The favorite Chinese beverage in the Chinese café of the Universal Exhibition is the Sher-Ry-Cob-Bler. It is made of a wine called Xeres in France, some lemon, sugar, and powdered ice. The mysteries of its brewing were taught by "Brigham" to some Californian, who taught some Chinaman, who taught some Frenchman, and armed him with the necessary straw."

WHAT TOM MAXWELL DID.

"WHO was that young fellow who seemed to be rather épris with your rector's pretty daughter?" said I to my friend Marcus Jermyn, as I settled myself down comfortably to a pipe and a chat in his cosy smoking-room, after a dinner party which he had given to some of the village magnates.

"What! Tom Maxwell, d' you mean?—the youngster who sat opposite to you?"

"Yes," said I; "there was something about his appearance I rather liked. Who is he?"

"He's a deuced plucky fellow, I can tell you," said Jermyn. "Why, did you never hear what Tom Maxwell did last winter?—it was in all the papers."

"Not I," said I. "I was in New York, you know, and missed a good deal of English news."

"Well, look here, old fellow; just get into that shooting-jacket, and brew yourself what you like, and I'll tell you the story."

Since I had seen Jermyn last he had succeeded to his father's property at Coxton, a pretty village on the east coast, and had settled down, very comfortably, to the ordinary routine of a country gentleman's life. I had been roving all over the world, partly on business and partly on pleasure, and having a few weeks before returned from a lengthened tour in the United States, I had run against Jermyn in the Strand, and he had made me promise to spend a few days with him at Christmas. Consequently, I found myself at the end of Christmas week, in his comfortable country-house.

"What will you drink, Fred?" said Jermyn. "Brandy? Try the whisky. It's rather a special good thing. Well," continued he, "you'd like to hear what Tom Maxwell did; but first you ought to know something about him. He's a pupil of old Sawyer, the vicar of Middleham, a village about a mile from here. Sawyer, who has a good deal in that ancient brain of his, but very little in his pocket, adds to the some hundred and fifty per annum, which draws from the Middleham tithe-payers, by taking a pupil or two.

At the time Maxwell came to Sawyer, about eighteen months ago, he had but one other pupil, a tall young fellow called Denton, most abominably conceited, and no favorite of us. I don't know what Denton did, except dwadle about and gossip, for he had as genuine a liking for scandal as any old woman in the place. Somehow or other he gave us all a general impression that the new pupil, Maxwell, was a regular milksop, fresh from his mother's apron-strings, and up to none of the ordinary pursuits of other youths. Of course such a character did him no good among the young ladies, and they need to pity one another when Maxwell fell to their lot at a dinner-party or dance. He certainly had very little to say for himself, and was uncommonly shy, and was therefore a great contrast to Denton; who would have thought nothing of strolling up to her Majesty at a levée, and advising her to let Buckingham Palace. In this way it got to be considered that Maxwell was a muff; and as he did nothing particular to remove this impression, it clung to him until the incident took place of which I am going to tell you,

It was on the 20th of January, that these two young fellows had been dining with us, and it being a fearful night, we had persuaded them both to stay all night, a thing they were often in the habit of doing, and which, we knew well, would give old Sawyer no anxiety. The sound of the wind and rain, and the distant roaring of the sea, made us all uncommonly glad to remain under a good roof. During dinner, in the intervals of talk, we could hear the rain beat against the windows with such force that I really thought they would be driven in, and many a time, often did one or the other of us say, 'What will the poor fellows at sea do to-night?' and look grave, as we thought of the too-likely possibility of some unfortunate vessel being off the coast. We all went to bed in very good time, that night, and were uncommonly glad to listen to the storm, through the medium of two or three thicknesses of stout blankets. I had been asleep about two hours when Mary awoke me and said she had heard the front door bell ring. I guessed at once what it was. I had given directions to the fishermen to send up to the Hall, whenever there was a ship on shore, and I felt certain that this was a message of that import. Accordingly, I slipped on my dressing-gown and went down to the door, and without opening it, asked who was there?

"'Tom Purvis,' was the answer.

"'What is it, Tom?' I said.

"'There's a ship on the Black Steal, sir.'

"'God help them, then, was my first ejaculation. 'I'll be down directly, Tom.' I said, and went up stairs to dress. Before doing so, however, I thought that these two lads might possibly like the excitement of the scene; and so I went into the double-bedded room where they were sleeping. Upon hearing my errand, Denton said that he had a cold, and that he had seen wrecks before, and that he thought he wouldn't come; but young Maxwell immediately began to dress, saying, that he didn't think he could sleep comfortably, knowing that some unfortunate sailors were perishing so near to us

"'Will they be able to do anything for them, do you think?' he asked me.

"'I fear not,' said I. 'The life-boat won't have a chance in such a sea as there must be, and I fear she may have struck too far off to be reached by a rocket. But be quick with your things, and we'll go down and see.'

"In five minutes we were both down at the hall door, well wrapped up in pilot-coats and mufflers; and good need we had of them, I can tell you, for the moment we opened the door the wind and rain rushed in with such force as to nearly blind us, and it required all our united strength to shut it again. Having at last, however done, so, we turned round, and faced the tempest. It was, in truth, a fearful night, and we could scarcely make any way against the wind, which blew certainly far stronger than I had ever known it do before. We linked our arms together and managed at last to reach the beach. The night was so dark that we could see nothing from the fishermen's cottages.

"'Where is she?' said I, to an old man who at one of the doors.

"'She's on the south of the Steal, sir,' said he. 'They're trying to reach her with a rocket from the jetty-end.'

"This jetty was formed on wooden piles, and ran a short way out to sea, It was only used by the fishing boats in certain states of the tide, to land their cargoes, and was a black, slimy, tumble-down affair at best. As we were making our way down the cliff, a matter of no little difficulty, we saw a stream of fire shoot in a curved direction, and knew that they had fired a rocket. Getting on to the beach, we made the best of our way through fishing boats, anchors, buoys, etc., and at last got on to the small, frail jetty, which seemed to stir and tremble with the force of the gigantic waves, which threw themselves furiously against it. Hurrying to the end, we found a tolerably large group of fishermen surrounding the two coastguardsmen who had charge of the rocket apparatus.

"'Do you make anything out of her, Harvey?' said I to one of the coastguard, who lived in the village, and who was a great ally of mine in fishing and boating expeditions.

"'Well, sir,' said he, 'I think she'll be a big French lugger that was knocking about, off and on, this afternoon. I said when I see'd her I wouldn't give much chance for her getting into harbor. It's so fearful dark, sir, that we can scarcely make her out a bit; but I fancy I picked out three masts, such as them great ugly French colliers have. We have missed her twice with the rockets—they both fell to the leeward of her, but we'll allow enough for this one, sir.'

"As he spoke, they got ready to fire another rocket, and this time, as far as they could guess, it went right over the unfortunate vessel. We had now begun to get our eyes accustomed to the darkness, and fancied we could make out a black, shapeless mass, about fifty or eighty yards before us. We could hear the cries of the poor fellows on board clearly enough, and the crushing grinding sound of the vessel on the rocks; and by the latter sound we knew that, unless something was quickly done, they would all perish.

"Just then, to the great delight of us all, some one on board fixed a lantern in the rigging, and by its light we could see that the coastguard had been right in their conjectures, and that it was one of those unwieldy luggers that trade between our northern coal-ports and France. We could also see that there was a group of people clustered amidships, who were evidently engaged in some operation, and directly afterwards the tightening of the rocket line showed us that it was being hauled in from the ship. A stronger line having been attached, on board, with clear directions in French, as to the management of the apparatus, was sent off, and then the cradle slid away on its errand of mercy. All this time the wind had continued to blow so hard that we had great difficulty in keeping our feet, added to which every now and then a wave broke over the jetty and deluged us with water. We were, however, too much interested in the fate of the French crew to think much of our personal inconveniences. At last, after what seemed to us an immense time, we could just make out that a man was getting carefully over the side of the ship and pulling the rope he came toward us into the darkness, and in a few minutes we were able to haul up upon the jetty a miserable half-drowned Frenchman, who very soon had the neck of a bottle of better coguac than he had ever before tasted thrust into his mouth.

"Off went the cradle again, and back it returned with the same result, until we soon had quite a little French colony, shivering and shaking on the jetty beside us. There only remained now the captain to be brought off, and, to our very great consternation, we made out from one of the crew, that he had announced his determination to 'stick by the ship,' and wait until morning, when, he imagined, the sea would go down. His reason for this was an idea he had got into his chivalric and foolish head that it was his duty as captain to do so, and that upon his leaving his deck he lost all claim to his vessel, which at once became the property of perfidious Albion.

"It was a marvel to all the experienced sailors on the jetty that she should have held together so long as she had done, and she was expected to break up every minute. What was to be done then for this foolish Frenchman, to compel him to save his life?

"We did not know what to do, and began to think that he must be left to his fate, when one of the fishermen was heard to say to another—

"'If some fellow, now, had pluck to go off and fetch him! If it wasn't for the wife and bairns, I'd go.'

"'And what would be the good of that,' said another, 'when you can't jabber a word of his confounded lingo?'

"There was a pause; and then, to my consternation, I heard a quiet voice at my elbow say—

"'That'll be the only plan. I understand French, and will go off to him and explain the matter.'

"'You, Maxwell?' I said. 'Stuff and nonsense, my dear fellow! I won't allow it for a moment!'

"'Excuse me, Mr. Jermyn, I do intend to go.'

"'No. I'll be hanged if you shall go!' said I. 'Good gracious me! are you to risk your life because a confounded, thick-headed old French skipper chooses to be an obstinate old mule? You shan't do it, Maxwell, I tell you.'

"His only reply was the taking off his watch, which he quietly handed to me.

"'The wet will injure it,' said he.

"'Now, Maxwell, do be reasonable,' said I. 'For God sake don't do this foolish thing. It's all very well being Quixotic, and all that sort of thing, but there is a limit to that, and this is beyond it. Come, let's go home; we can do no good here.'

But I had mistaken my man and my power over him. He took me aside and spoke so seriously and sensibly, that I had no argument with which to confute his, and at last was compelled to give in, protesting all the while against it.

I give you my word, Fred, that I was never so miserable in my life before. Here was a boy who was virtually, if not actually, in my charge, going into the most fearful danger, and and I was powerless to stop him. If anything happened to this boy what was I to say to his parents, and what would they say to me?

"However, the thing was evidently unavoidable, and I bestirred myself to see that all that was possible to secure his safety should be done. By this time it became known among the men on the pier that the lad had volunteered for the duty, which, no doubt, some one might have done but for their ignorance of the French. Some of them were very much against it, and at one time there seemed a chance of it being prevented; but Maxwell said a few words to them, and they gave a cheer, and set about getting him into the cradle. This was soon done, and with another ringing British cheer, the young fellow went off on his perilous expedition.

"We could just make out that he had reached the vessel and then a very long time went by without any sign whatever. The excitement in all our minds, and in mine especially, was painful in the extreme. The coastguardsmen, old experienced men-of-war's men, and the fishermen, were all in a state of wonder that the vessel had held together so long, and we all expected that every minute would be the last. At length, after what seemed at least an hour, but which, I fancy, could really only have been about ten minutes, we saw a man get over the side of the vessel, and soon the cause of all our anxiety—a fat, pudgy, elderly Frenchman—was hauled on to the jetty; and if he did get a little roughly handled and shaken in getting him clear of the ropes, why I don't think he was much to be pitied. I need not say that the cradle was sent off again as quickly as possible, and we saw, to our great delight, that young Maxwell was getting into it. We haul in with a will, when all of a sudden the vessel seemed to collapse and go completely to pieces. A great cry arose from all on the jetty, and we thought Maxwell lost, when, to our infinite delight, we heard his voice close to us. He had just reached the jetty, when the rope gave way, from the vessel breaking up; but he clung tightly to it, and in a moment he was pulled up among us, and was almost devoured by the delighted fishermen, who crowded round to shake hands and ply him with brandy.

"It was undoubtedly one of the narrowest escapes that was ever heard of. Nothing could have saved him, if the waves had dashed him against the jetty. But he fell just clear of the sea, and we had him up before one of the large waves could come.

"I need not say that Master Maxwell was the hero of the neighborhood for some time to come. But, bless you instead of giving himself airs about it, as Denton would have done, and putting himself in the way of being complimented, nothing seemed to worry him more than hearing it talked about: and I have often known that the story was being told, although I could not hear it, from the way Maxwell used to fidget about, and his unhappy expression of countenance. He's nearly as shy as ever, although he's been considerably petted by all the girls about ever since."

"He should have that new decoration," said I.

"Ah! I wish it had been instituted then," said Jermyn; "no one could have better deserved it. We got him the Humane Society's medal, but I don't know what he has done with it. No one has ever seen it since he received it. And now," said Jermyn, yawning, "I must be off I'm not used to this sort of thing now, and feel rather demoralized already from the society of such a rolling-stone as you are, old-fellow. Good night."

I left Coxton the next day, but thought the story of "What Tom Maxwell did" worth recording.—All the Year Round.

SEA MUSIC.

BY EDMUND THORBALD.

THE gray unresting sea,
Adown the bright and belting shore,
Breaking in untold melody,
Makes music evermore.

Centuries of vanished time
Since the glad earth's primeval morn,
Have heard the grand unpausing chime,
Momently, aye new-born.

Like us in cloistered piles,
Rich bursts of masive sonnd upswell,
Ringing along dim-lighted aisles
With spirit-trancing spell;

So on the surf-white strand;
Chants of deep peal the sea-waves raise,
Like voices from a viewless land,
Hymning a hymn of praise.

By times, in thunder notes,
The booming billows shoreward surge;
By times, a silvery laugh infloats;
By times, a low soft dirge.

Souls more ennobled grow,
Listing the wordless anthem rise;
Discords are drowned in the great flow
Of Nature's harmonies.

Men change, and "cease to be,"
And empires rise and grow and fall,
But the weird music of the sea
Lives, and outlives them all.

That mystic song shall last
Till time itself no more shall be;
Till seas and shores have pass'd,
Lost in eternity.

GOSSIP ABOUT FRENCH COMIC ACTORS.

THE other night a painful incident interrupted the performance of "La Grande Duchesse de Gerolsteio" at the Varietes Theatre. In the midst of a galop, Grenier, the actor, fell and screamed in a lamentable voice, "I have broken my leg." The audience roared with laughter. His fellow actors themselves said, "Just like Grenier—always full of fun! Now we are going to laugh!" Nevertheless, it became necessary to lower the curtain, and Grenier, still attired in his grotesque costume of Prince Paul, was carried home on a litter.

The public refuse to believe that those droll fellows, whose trade is to make men laugh, can be subject to the common infirmities and woes of humanity. Everybody has heard the story of Dominique, who amused the Paris of the 17th century. One day a sombre and wretched man called on the leading physician of the day. The Doctor asked him, "What is the matter with you?"

"I know not. I am oppressed by the heaviest spirits. The most sombre thoughts constantly cloud my mind, and there is scarcely an hour of my life—so wretched am I—in which I am not tempted to commit suicide."

"Then, my dear fellow, the best thing you can do is to go and see Dominique play."

"Doctor I am Dominique."

The physician could believe neither his eyes nor his ears! How was it possible so funny a fellow could be so gloomy!

By a law, contrary to that which the vulgar believe prevails, it may with truth be said comic actors are commonly melancholic men. Observations made on comic actors of our day confirm in general this theory.

The illustrious Potier was not exactly melancholic, we are told by those who knew him, but he was always uneasy. Note the word, it has a deep meaning. It was this uneasiness which destroyed Bouffé's career. One day he began to doubt his action on the public. Now, if you ever saw your audience cold and grave while telling them a funny story, you may understand how disheartened a comic actor is in the presence of a public which is unmoved by his pleasantries. Then there is an end of laughter, and the stage numbers another sad comic actor. Tiercelin, the modern Taconnet, had his profession in horror. After he retired from the stage no consideration could induce him to walk by the Theatre des Varietés. Brunet, whom we knew very well, was a very grave fellow. He produced a great deal of laughter, without ever thinking of laughing himself at his drollery. He played Schaabaham with as much gravity as Talma ever played his most tragical parts. Brunet respected the text of the authors of the Varietes Theatre as scrupulously as if it had been the text of Racine or Corneille. An interpolation of his own fun would have seemed profanation to him. Brunet's life was ended by a great many domestic sorrows; his family caused him much grief; but the theatre was always foremost in his thoughts. He did really consider his profession a sort of priesthood. His candor, which was proverbial, constantly betrayed the tension of his mind. One day in the green-room of the Varietés, in the height of the most violent emotions of the Revolution of July, the persons present talked about politics, war, an European coalition, riots and the like themes, and somebody said, "King Louis Phillippe must feel extremely embarrassed."

Brunet exclaimed, "How would he feel had he three parts to play every evening?"

Monrose, the best Figaro and the most illustrious Mascarille, who ever appeared at the French comedy, was a man of very agitated temperament. He died insane. Arnal has been an odd fish all his life. His comrades and managers have always said "he was a hard fellow to get along with." He seems wounded by the prejudice which sticks to his profession, and flies society when he is welcomed only to raise laughter. Odry, whom I likewise knew very well, expressed in his way this Philistine stupidity, which supposes a comic actor can never assume a grave attitude in company. Odry said to me in the country-house to which he had retired, "I go nowhere because everybody thinks I can say nothing without provoking peals of laughter. A short time since I determined to go the funeral of an old friend of forty years' standing. When I entered the church I went to my friend's son-in-law and asked, "What was the matter with our poor friend?" The son-in-law recognized me, took his handkerchief, clapped it on his mouth to repress the peals of an indecent gayety, and I heard him say to his neigbbor, "'Tis that infernal Odry,—what a d—l of a joker!"

Alcide Tonsez was likewise a melancholic fellow. Sainville, during the last years of his life, was a martyr to the gout and rheumatism. "That joyous comic actor," as the newspapers called him, was filled with funereal presentiments, when you met him in the morning, scarcely able to draw one leg after the other. Passers said, "There is Sainville; he is a fellow who leads a gay life." Vernet's life was afflicted and abridged by the gout. Villars, an excellent actor, well-known to all frequenters of the Varietés and Gymnase, was sad unto death he committed suicide. In the last generation, I remember a very comic actor of the Gaité, named Basnage, who blew his brains out. One of the most popular and applauded actors of Paris said to me a few days since, "If I knew how to do anything else I should never play on the stage again." There are comic actors who have a good social position, who lead regular, methodical lives; but they too are victims of the professional sadness. One of them said to me, "My children have never seen me on the stage."

"Why not?"

"Because I am afraid they would no longer respect me."

The stage includes too a peculiar sort of martyrs, namely, the actor who, having discarded Jocrisse's yellow fluxen wig, has retired to the country, married a Philistine's daughter, blushes at his old profession, and becomes as embarrassed as an escaped felon, when an unexpected meeting, the passage of an old comrade through town, may betray his incognito. I have known this class of martyrs. I went to a small town one day. The mayor invited me to dine with him. While I was dressing I received in my hotel the visit of the chief physician of the town. In his younger days this doctor had played country bumpkins on the stage. He knew we were to meet at the mayor's house, and he came to ask me to make no allusion to the follies of his youth.

Still more delicate is the position of a woman, who, after having shone on the stage of the Palais Royal and Varietés, at the race-field and at the Cafe Anglais, retires to the provinces and marries a sub-treasurer, goes regularly to church, and is recommended to public esteem by her decorous bearing and her scruples in everything appertaining to religion and morals. If, unfortunately, Bilboquet should come strolling through the village, you may imagine the terror of Zephyrine, thou-d every other word, and caressed by the big red hands of a strolling player, who had as lief as not say before all the church wardens and the municipal council, "O, my little beauty, and this is the secret of thy sale? We melted all the trinkets and jewels to make us an income of $1,200 a year; and we found a shareholder in the provinces, eh? All the better! all the better, my darling! Youth soon slips away, and a fat turkey like thee can't dance the cachuka. Besides, men have become deceitful rogues at Paris. They spend all their money on the Queen of Diamonds. To be sure there are little rogues, who manage to wing a carriage and pair out of young chaps; but more show than substance. They have a servant in their ante-chamber, but they have still more sheriffs after them. And yet, after all, fat turkey, if thou wilt play on my benefit night, hang me if I sha'n't put you in capitals on the bill."

As may easily be supposed Zephyrine prefers giving fifty francs to Bilhoquet rather than to play at his benefit. This reappearance would assure her disappearance from the fashionable society of her village.—Translated from Every Saturday from Le Soleil.

CRETAN WOMEN.—Two women went with a late detachment, with rifles on their shoulders. "If," they said, "we are in camp, we will work for you; if the Turks are near, we know how to shoot." Another, with all her worldly goods in a little bag on her back and a rifle on her shoulder, was chased by some Turks. One Turk got near her and cried out in Greek, "Drop your bag." She dropped it, and, kneeling behind it, shot the pursuer through the heart. Then, picking up her pack, she escaped to her friends.

BAILY—STANFIELD—ALISON.

THREE eminent men of England, all born in the last century, have just died. Baily, R. A., the sculptor; Stanfield, R. A., the marine painter; and Alison, the historian of Europe. Baily, born in Bristol in 1788, was intended for trade, and at the age of fourteen was placed in a counting-house; but the attractions of art were too great for him, and after a probation of two years, he left his situation and became a wax-modeller of portraits. Stimulated, it is said, however, by the sight of Bacon's monument to the memory of Stearne's "Eliza," in Bristol, he soon gave up wax and adopted clay as the material for his art. The result justified the confidence he had displayed in himself. He married, came to London, and by the kind interposition of a friend, was received into the studio of Flaxman. This was the beginning of a career which was closed only a few days ago. The sculptor of "Eve at the Fountain" was beloved by all who knew him.

Clarkson Stanfield, ten years younger than his fellow academician, had been a sailor, having served in the same ship of war as Douglas Jerrold. When the latter produced his well-known drama, "The Rent Day," at Surrey Theatre, he met on the boards for the first time after sixteen years Clarkson Stanfield, who, like himself, had deserted the sea for a more congenial pursuit. Meantime the one had become a famous scene painter, the other a successful dramatist. Stanfield's first large picture, "Wreckers off Fort Rouge," was exhibited at the British Institution in 1827. In 1832 the artist was elected an associate of the Royal Academy, and three years afterwards attained to the full dignity of his profession. His marine paintings are the best in England.

The author of "A History of Europe from the Commencement of the French Revolution to the Battle of Waterloo," and of a continuation "to the Accession of Louis Napoleon," had for some time been ailing; and, although a day or two before his death he was pronounced better, no hope was entertained of his recovery. The deceased baronet was a prolific writer. In addition to the works enumerated, he was the author of numerous legal treatise and literary and periodical articles, of the "Life of the Duke of Marlborough," of "Principles of Population," a reply to Malthus, and of "England in 1815 and 1845, or a Sufficient or Contracted Currency." Sir Archibald was the son of the author of an "Essay on Taste." In 1834 he was appointed sheriff of Lanarkshire, and, on the accession to power in 1858 of Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli, a baronetcy was conferred on him by the Queen. At the time of his death he was in his 75th year.

WRESTLING MATCHES BETWEEN GIRLS.—The Japanese and the Arabs have recently given our amusement-loving public some extraordinary entertainments, but none of them, we should think, can equal an exhibition lately witnessed by an English traveler at the Rapp Theatre in Stockholm, Sweden. This was a series of wrestling matches between girls, and is thus described: "They were apparently of the class called extras at theatres, and were dressed in long-sleeved shirts fastening around the throat, the short loose trousers of the deboardeur, tights, of course, and boots. They had been instructed in certain rules for the strife (which defined the space of the adversary's body for the gripe, and forbade pinching and kicking,) all duly set forth in the playbills; and with the pay of a rixdollar a night apiece, and a prize of four rixdollars for the winner, were left to fight it on the stage. The principal dancer picked out four couples one after the other, and as the fate of each pair was decided, the vanquished girl retired to the back of the stage; while the winner stood on one side to wrestle again with the others equally fortunate as herself. It was a thoroughly genuine thing, and really well worth seeing. The girls dodged, and gripped, and struggled in good earnest, and many were the mishaps to hair and garments, and many the strong white limb exposed; while the ever-changing attitudes of their lissom forms, so unconsciously significant and graceful, deserved the lens of the photographer or the sculptor's chisel to confer undying immortality on Herr Rappo, the manager. As the ties were worked off the excitement grew very severe; and when the last couple, blown, dishevelled, and flushed, stood up for the four rix, the backing of green breeches or red breeches was like the clatter of a betting-ring when the odds are rising on the favorite, and the "professionals" find themselves on the gridiron.

"This extremely æsthetic exhibitian, with tableaux vivants, pantomimic ballet, performances on the trapez, and a presentation of the immortal fight of Sayers and Heenan between a couple of wretched Whitechapel acrobats, was all to be seen for the highest price of two rix-dollars—and no smoking allowed!"

EXCESS of ceremony shows a want of breeding. That civility is best which excludes all superfluous formality.

"WE see," says Swift, in one of his most sarcastic moods "what God thinks of riches by the people he gives them to."

AN INDIGNANT SAVANT ON THE "ORDER OF NATURE."

SINCE the time when Bishop Watson made his well-known attempt to frame a satisfactory reply to Hume's famous "Argument against Miracles," the contest between the men of science who insist upon the absolute and necessary uniformity of "the Order of Nature," and the theologians who maintain that that order has, at certain times, and for certain purposes been interrupted, has never entirely subsided, substantially the same question being constantly revived in one shape or another, at short intervals. But though the possibility of miracles has generally been the starting point of the discussion, it is in reality, like the kindred one in regard to the Principle of Causality, purely speculative and philosophical in its character, having no necessary connection with theology. But, as the vast majority of mankind take little interest in metaphysical disputes, none, except the comparatively small class of persons addicted to speculative studies, have any distinct idea of the various theories of "Causation" and the "nexus" that have from time to time been elaborated, or of the nature of the conflict which has been waged by generation after generation of eager metaphysicians on this still contested battle-ground. The discussion in regard to the order of nature, would have proved as uninteresting to the world at large, and would have remained as little known, had it retained its abstract character. But when it came in contact with theology, and was applied to the question of the credibility of the New Testament naratives of miraculous occurrences, it assumed a practical shape, and from being a speculative subject, interesting only to philosophers, became a popular one that vitally concerned every believer in the supernatural power and character of Christ, and in the Special Providence of God. Accordingly, while the debate that has raged around the Principle of Causality has been left to the metaphysicians, and has never intruded itself into the field of popular literature. The question in regard to the permanence of the Order of Nature is, in some of its aspects at least, familiar to all intelligent persons, and occasionally crops out in the popular magazines and even in the newspapers,

Accordingly, we are not at all surprised to find in a recent number of Messrs, Ticknor & Field's Every Saturday, an article entitled "Miracles and Special Providences," copied from the London Fortnightly Review, in which Professor Tyndal, a man of physical Science, undertakes to refute and rebuke, Mr. Mozley, a theologian and a "Brampton Lecturer," for the energetic and somewhat disdainful attack, made by the latter, upon the "Argument from Experience, as a philosophical foundation for the belief in "The Order of Nature." The essay of Mr. Mozley which provoked Professor Tyndal's attempt at, refutation, occurs in the volume of "Brampton Lectures" for 1865. These lectures, like the more celebrated course by Mr. Mansel, delivered ten years earlier, upon the same foundation, on "The limits of Religious Thought," are characterized by great boldness, and rare intellectual subtlety, evincing at the same time that thorough mastery of all the weapons of metaphysical dialectics for which the severely trained logicians of Oxford and Cambridge have long been noted

This volume, Professor Tyndal took with him, as he informs us, as the companion of a summer tour among the Alps, There, during the wet and snowy days, he tells us he "made himself thoroughly conversant" with the book, which he found "clear and strong—an intellectual tonic, as bracing and pleasant to the mind, as the keen air of the mountains was to the body." From time to time, he "jotted down his thoughts regarding it, intending afterwards, if time permitted, to work them up into a coherent whole." The article in the Fortnightly Review is the outcome of these meditations and jottings.

It is only that portion of the discussion that involves the question of the value of the "argument from experience" that we propose at present to concern ourselves with. On this point Mr. Mozley is perfectly explicit. He insists that experience can only deal with the past, and that the moment we attempt to project it a single step beyond the point it has at any moment reached, we are condemned by reason, Miracles, it is urged, are incredible, because contrary to the order of nature. But what do we mean by our belief in this order? Simply replies the Baampton Lecturer, our belief that the future will be like the past; and for this belief though he admits its existence as a kind of unreasoning instinct, he insists there is not the slightest rational basis. We have no evidence that any cause in nature is more permanent than its known effects, that it will produce other instances additional to those produced already. Such is substantially his proposition. By way of illustration, he supposes the case of the occurrence of a particular physical phenomenon for the first time. The witnesses of that single occurrence would have, he thinks, "but the very faintest expectation of another. If it did occur again, once or twice, so far from counting on another occurrence, a cessation would occur as the most natural event to us, But let it continue one hundred times and we should find no hesitation in inviting persons from a distance to see it; and if it occurred every day for years, its occurrence would be a certainty to us, its cessation a marvel."

Such are the facts in regard to the effect produced upon the mind by witnessing the regular recurrence of natural phenomena. But what do these facts prove? What ground of reason can be assigned for the expectation that the course of nature will continue to be the next moment what it has been up to this moment? To this interrogatory Mr. Mozley does not hesitate to reply decidedly that no such ground can be assigned. "No reason," he declares, "can be given for this belief. It is without reason. It rests upon no rational grounds, and can be traced to no rational principle."

In developing his argument on this point, Mr. Mozley says some things that are not only striking, but startling; some things that could not fail to seem repellant and offensive to a certain class of the devotees of physical science, and which have evidently been taken by Professor Tyndal, as something in the nature of a personal affront. Our nature, according to the Brampton Lecturer, though endowed with reason, contains "large irrational departments;" and it is to one of these "irrational departments" that he refers the instinctive belief in the order of nature. Acknowledging that this belief, however irrational, is widely diffused, he suggests the following bold theory in explanation of the fact; "It is necessary, all-important for the purposes of life, but solely practical, and possesses no intellectual character. . . . . The proper function of the inductive principle, the argument from experience, the belief in the order of nature—by whatever phrase we designate the same instinct—is to operate as a practical basis for the affairs of life and the carrying on of human society.

In short, Mr. Mozley, while conceding that the belief in the "order of nature," is general, maintains that it is an unintelligent instinct or impulse, of which we can give no rational account, an instinct designed for purely practical purposes, to induce us to till our fields, to provide our winter food and fuel, and adapt ourselves to the exigencies of life. "Thus, step by step," says our author, "has philosophy loosened the connection of the order of nature, with the ground of reason, befriending in exact proportion as it has done this, the principle of miracles." Inasmuch as the belief in question being itself destitute of any foundation in reason, "the ground is gone, upon which it could be maintained that miracles, as opposed to the order of nature, are opposed to reason." Again; when we analyze this belief in its relation to science, as the so-called "inductive principle," we find that it is only an unreasoning impulse applied to a scientifically ascertained fact. Science has led up to the fact, but there it stops, and for the purpose of converting this fact into a law, "a totally unscientific principle comes into play, the same as that which generalizes the commonest observations of nature."

Such is substantially the ground assumed by Mr. Mozley; and it is set forth with sufficient directness to make it easily intelligible. What is Professor Tyndal's mode of meeting the argument? It is curious, and also perfectly characteristic of the school of which he is a representative. He does not even so much as attempt a reply upon logical and philosophical grounds. But instead of any such attempt, he furnishes us with a number of striking illustrations of the progress of physical science. Unable, or reluctant, to encounter Mr. Mozley upon his own ground, he furnishes us with a quite irrelevant history of the successive steps by which the weight of the atmospheric column was ascertained, by which Newton arrived at his theory of gravitation, and by which astronomers are enabled to calculate eclipses. Mr. Mozley demands some ground in reason, for the belief that the future will correspond to the part, for the belief that because the sun has risen every morning during every day of the historic period, it will rise to-morrow. Professor Tyndal, declining to meet him upon his own ground, simply accumulates evidences of the uniformity of the "order of nature," within the period of which we have any knowledge. But it is evident that those evidences fall short of proof, and that they still leave the expectations that are based upon them, "without any rational ground." Professor Tyndal, seems himself to feel, not without a certain impotent irritation, that the ground taken by his opponent, is logically impregnable, for in concluding his "argument," he breaks forth into a most remarkable apostrophe, which is quite unprecedented in philosophical discussion. The apostrophe alluded to, is as follows:

"To the theologian, with his wonderful theories of the 'odor of nature,' I would in conclusion say, 'Keep to the region—not, however, exclusively yours—which is popularly known as the human heart: the region, I am willing to confess, of man's greatest nobleness and most sublime achievements. Cultivate this, if it be in you to do so; and it may be in you; for love and manhood are better than science, and they may render you three times less unworthy than many of those who possess ten times your natural knowledge. But, unless you come to her as a learner, keep away from physical nature. Here, in all frankness I would declare, that at present you are ill-informed, self-deluded, and likely to delude others. Farewell!"

A careful perusal of Professor Tyndall's reply to Mr. Mozley's argument, has satisfied us that the question under discussion, is one that will never be definitively settled; that there are two distinct classes of minds so essentially differing in their modes of thought that they never can be at one so far as questions involving the recognition of the supernatural is concerned. The difference appears to us, to be one of natural constitution and temperament, and one that can never be reconciled by any logical process. There are minds to which the idea of a God outside of Nature, and prescribing her laws is utterly repugnant, and another class of minds to which this idea is congenial and acceptable. These classes are not to be distinguished by any difference in force of intellect, or extent of acquirement. Men of equal intellectual power, and equal in training and learning are to be found on both sides. The difference must be sought in the kind and quality of the intellectual power, rather than in their force and quantities. There seem to be minds that naturally gravitate to an acceptance of the supernatural, and others, to which from their very constitution, and congenital peculiarities, it is an absolute impossibility to accept such a belief. In short, as it seems to us, the Voltaires, Comptes, Buckles, Drapers, and Tyndall's, do not differ so much in intellectual force or scholastic acquirements, from the Miltons, Butlers, Guizots, Bunsens, Arnolds, Mansells, and Mozleys, as they do in the natural bias of their minds, and the constitutional peculiarities of their intellects. Hence we infer that the questions in regard to which they differ, will never be settled so authoratively as to result in a unanimity of opinion and belief.

CARLYLE AND THE CHELSEA ROUGHS.—The London Review remarks "that the reason why the Chelsea riff-raff insult Mr. Carlyle as he rides or walks about the streets, according to the rather startling relation of Mr. Ruskin, is that he adopts singular costume, and in particular that he wears a huge [illegible] hat, of peculiar shape, which renders him an object of remark and a butt for ridicule. Undoubtedly it is a very shameful thing for the Chelsea rapscallions to revile a philosopher on the score of his clothes; but it may also be a question whether it is not a foolish thing on the part of Mr. Carlyle to affect singularity in a matter which, after all, is an affair of no moment. If we are not mistaken, it is in his admirable essay on Jean Paul Ritcher that Mr. Carlyle remarks that, in proportion as a man feels himself compelled to oppose society on serious grounds, he should avoid giving it offence in trivial concerns. And he makes this remark with reference to some affected oddity of costume in which his hero for a time indulged. It is true that the Chelsea roughs can hardly be accepted as "society;" still, it is perhaps a mistake to provoke their foolish intolerance for the very small pleasure of wearing a grotesque hat.

INDEPENDENT CANDIDATES.—Mr. Henry S. Davis, the present sheriff, and Mr. John C. Pelton, present Superintendent of Public Schools, have placed their names before the public as independent candidates for the coming election, for the offices they now hold. We do not know whether Mr. Davis' name was before the Union convention as a candidate for nomination for the shrievalty, or not. Mr. Pelton publicly refused to submit his name before the convention, and preferred to appeal direct to the public, to substantiate his claim to their support. Both gentlemen have filled their offices with ability, and to the general satisfaction of the public. It is certainly an evil, and more than a political one in its consequences, to demand a continual change of officers in positions whose duties are so intricate, multitudinous, and diffused as those of the Sheriff and Superintendent of Public Schools of our city. Those offices, above all others, should be made tenable for four years by an especial enactment, as it takes nearly half that time for their incumbents to become familiar with their manifold duties. Routine in office, in place of being good policy, is a very bad one.

UNDER the captions of "Religious sects and the Pockets of the People," the New York Herald argues that no more appropriations of the people's money be made, for the support of sectarian institutions. The Herald expresses itself to the effect, that every dollar invested from the public treasury, for the support of religious institutions, plants a seed for a future religious war, building up moneyed monopolies, that finally forget their religious creed, or only remember it to make the people accept it at the point of the sword.

REVIEWS OF OLD BOOKS.

BY DOGBERRY.

MOTHER GOOSE. By a fool.
A new edition of this volume is just out, and preserves its usual characteristic of having apparently been edited by some one out of his head. There is, however, an exquisite tenderness and fidelity to nature in the lines,

"Jack Spratt could eat no fat,
His wife could eat no lean,
So twixt them both they cleared the cloth
And licked the platter clean."

The poet has evidently moved in the more humble walks of life, and it is more than evident that he has been a witness to scenes similar to that described.

The imagination of the true poet often soars to such a height even in the description of the common events and affairs of ordinary life as not to be comprehended save by those on the same mental plane as himself. But the author of the lines has committed no such fault and while giving play to his imagination, has never for a moment transcended the bounds of probability.

Leaving the domestic and connnbial we come to verse bringing to our minds the pomp and grandeur of the warlike hero:

"Who comes here? A grenadier.
What d'ye want?
A pot of beer.
Where's your money?
I forgot!
Get you gone
You drunken sot."

Herein are at once displayed the faults and pecuniary vicessitudes to which the disciples of Mars are so frequently exposed. The hero, returning from the wars and wishing to solace himself with the delights of temporary inebriation is repulsed, abused and refused limited credit by those whose lives and property he has so bravely defended.

Here is depicted another phase of existence:

"See saw, Margery Daw,
Sold her bed and laid on straw;
Wasn't she a shiftless flirt,
To sell her bed and lay in the dirt?"

What more forcible description could be given of the lamentable consequences of a lack of thrift, foresight and frugality? The committal to memory and recitation of these lines will, in the future, save many a human being from the disagreeable contingencies imposed upon Margery Daw, who, unable to set any bounds to her extravagance, disposed of her couch for a consideration, and was then obliged to seek repose in unpleasant and unclean localities. But we are unable to review this work any further, so much do we feel imbned with the spirit of the author. It may be had at any of our principal book stores.

THE CALIFORNIA MARKET.—On Wednesday evening, the new market on California street between Montgomery and Kearny strects, was thrown open for public inspection, and was thronged from the hour of its opening until it was closed, by a crowd of visitors. On the following morning it was opened for business. The California market is a fine building, and is well adapted to the purpose for which it was erected. It consists of three wide aisles, on either side of which are handsome stalls. All the untidy portion of the market business, such as picking poultry, preparing joints, etc., are transacted in the spacious basement, and the upstairs department will always present a neat and cleanly appearance. The occupants are all pleased with their new location, and the public must certainly appreciate the change. A glance at the directory, which appears on our sixteenth page, will give some idea of the number and variety of businesses represented in the California Market.

THE proper treatment of the Indians, is being discussed extensively by the influential press of the country. The question appears to be viewed in two very different aspects, going the entire length of two extremes, one party counselling leniency, the other, extermination. History seems to indicate, that a large majority of the American aborigines, cannot exist in contact with the white race, that their extinction sooner or later, under the circumstances, is a law of Nature.

DIAMONDS.—A recent English work on diamonds and other precious stones says that but a small portion of the gems sold and worn are genuine. The diamond mines of Golconda are giving out, and those of India are rapidly failing. The scarcity of real gems has been met by the ingenuity of counterfeiters, who manufacture spurious gems that frequently deceive expert connoisseurs. Large quantities of false gems are made in Birmingham and Paris, and shipped East, where the Orientals sell them to credulous European travelers as the real article.

A BERLIN newspaper publishes this card: "I hear Prussia is about to send to the Paris Exhibition a model school-house. If Prussia desires to complete the specimen by sending at the same time a schoolmaster dying of hunger, I offer to represent to the life that other model for a very low rate of pay.—BACULUS, a schoolmaster with a salary of $30 a year."

DRAMATIC AFFAIRS.

ON Monday, Mr. Edwin Adams appeared as "Hamlet," a character in which he has gained immense reputation. Maguire's Opera House was, as a matter of course, crowded. On Tuesday, Othello was produced with Mr. Adams in the title role. I cannot speak well of Mr. Adams' impersonation of "Othello." The character is one to which he is peculiarly unsuited. If there is one thing which Mr. Adams is unable to do effectively it is rant. "Othello" is required by the text to rant, and rant most furiously at times. He is a rough soldier who suspects his wife of inconstancy, and his rage is brutal, bloody, noisy. Mr. Adams presents far too quiet an "Othello." In the first act he was quite at home, and the speech before the senate was most effectively delivered. Mr. McCullough lacked earnestness in the part of "Iago;" he made it too much a light comedy role; he was an indifferent villain; there was too little devil in him. Miss Sallie Hinckley played "Desdemona" very well in some scenes, especially that after she has been charged by "Othello" with unchasteness; the bewildered, half-insane air with which she appealed to "Emilia" and "Iago" was very well simulated; the part was as a whole however, too heavy for her. Mrs. Sophie Edwin played "Emilia" with great force, and was heartily applauded. Mr. Edwards played "Cassio" extremely well, and Barry was of course good as Roderigo, This play could be produced splendidly with Mr. Edwards as "Othello," Mr. Adams as "Iago" and Mr. McCullough as "Cassio;" with such a cast each part would he played perfectly. On Wednesday, The Marble Heart was played with Mr. Adams in the role of "Volage," Mr. John McCullough assuming the role of "Raphael." Mr. Adams played "Volage" splendidly, and appeared to enjoy his part much more than he did the melancholy one of "Raphael." Mr. John McCullough rendered his part very effectively, and the play was well performed throughout. On Thursday evening, Damon and Pythias was presented with Edwin Adams as "Pythias" and John McCullough as "Damon." Mr. Adams performed "Pythias" very effectively. Mr. McCullough tried his voice too severely; it sounded harsh and discordant in the passionate passages. Mrs. Sophie Edwin was excellent as "Hermion," and Miss Sallie Hinckley played "Calanthe" very well indeed. Last night, Edwin Adams took his second benefit, appearing as "Rover" in the ever popular comedy of Wild Oats. This capital play will be performed this afternoon. The entertainment this evening will consist of Othello, with a change in the cast, Mr. McCullough playing the title role, and Mr. Adams "Iago," this is an improvement. Mr. Adams is sure to make a good "Iago."

On Monday the military drama of Ours, which had such a successful run in New York will be produced. It has been carefully rehearsed and will be presented in excellent style. Kidd's splendid brass band has been engaged, and will add much to the effect of the grand finale. This piece was written by T. W. Robertson and Artemus Ward, and is founded on incidents which actually occurred during the Crimean War The popularity of Mr. Adams continues undiminished, and a constant succession of novelties has the effect of crowding the house nightly.

The Metropolitan Theatre inaugurated a new order of things, on Monday night. The company at this theatre, has been so much strengthened, that it is now capable of producing almost any style of play well. On Monday, the veteran actor, James H. Vinson, famed for his clever impersonations of old men and character parts, and Mr. and Mrs. Harry Jackson joined the company. Bouciault's capital play of Grimaldi was performed, and afforded Mr. Vinson an opportunity of at once firmly establishing himself in the favor of the public. The cast was a strong one, and the piece was capitally played. On Wednesday evening, the play of Masks and Faces was presented, for the benefit of the Union Guard. The house was crowded, and the performance went off splendidly. The entertainment commenced with The Old Guard, in which Mr. Vinson played "Haversac" very well, and Mrs. Harry Jackson was very good as "Milane."

In Masks and Faces, Mr. Vinson charmed the audience by the natural manner in which he impersonated "Triplet." I think that he was, however, sometimes almost too natural, and displayed too little art in making points. Mr. Harry Jackson's "Peg Woffington" was a very fine piece of acting, and her reading of the few serious passages which occur in the part was thrilling. Miss Emma Howson lacked vitality sufficient to play "Mabel Vane;" she was terribly tame and displayed so little emotion, that one scene at least, was rendered ridiculous. Miss Howson sings charmingly, looks very pretty in burlesque, but she lacks the force necessary to success in dramatic parts. Miss Clelia, who had the small role of Kitty Clive," is a most promising young actress; she throws her whole soul into her part, whatever it may be, and always plays it well. Harry Jackson's "Colly Cibber," was a clever piece of acting. Between the first piece and the drama, the favorite tenor, Henri Herberte, sang a ballad in splendid style, and was greatly applauded. Masks and Faces was repeated on Thursday night. Last night Grimaldi was performed. To-night Boucicault's drama of The Willow Copse will be presented. On Monday a startlingly sensational drama entitled The Incendiaries, will be produced. On Tuesday, Philippe and Julien Martinetti will take their farewell benefit. A new pantomime will be produced, and the members of the Turn Verein who have volunteered their services will assist. There is no lack of novelty at the Metropolitan, and a company which includes the Howson's, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Jackson, Mr. Vinson, Mrs. C. R. Sannders, H. D. Thompson, Pierpont Thayer and S. W. Leach is undeniably a strong one; one or two additional members will make it one of the strongest ever bronght together on the San Francisco boards.

Ralph Keeler delivered his lectnre entitled "Views Barefooted," on Tuesday evening, to a fair audience. The lecturer gave a gossipping account of how he traveled through Europe and only spent $181 in gold and silver, that amount being supplemented by a fair supply of brass. The audience was a good humored one, and ever ready to applaud when the lecturer made a point.

TOUCHSTONE.

ITALIAN OPERA.—The experiment of an operatic matinée last Saturday, with Ione, its fifth representation, was remarkably successful, the performance being, we are told, one of the finest of the season, and the house crowded. Il Trovatore, in which the present troupe have never been equalled here, will be given at 2 o'clock this afternoon, with reduced prices of admission, as on last Ssturday. Ernani was performed on Monday evening, and Lucia di Lammermoor on Wednesday, to moderately full houses; and Signor Limberti presented La Traviata, and the grand Trio from the third act of I Lombardi for his benefit, on Thursday evening, which was attended by a numerous audience. The artists have in general, during the week, acquitted themselves admirably, and we regret very much the comparative apathy of the public. On Monday evening, however, L'Africaine will be produced, and we may expect crowded houses for some time. Great care, frequent rehearsals and the expenditures of much money, should insure the success of this opera. The scenery is very beautiful, and the ship scene in which the vessel is seen tossing about on the waves, is most effectively produced. Every one is anxious to hear L'Africaine, of which they have read so much, and we trust that it will prove as great a success here, as it has in every other city in which it has been produced.

FIRST HEBREW BENEVOLENT SOCIETY'S BENEFIT.—The benefit tendered to the First Hebrew Benevolent Society by the members of the B'nai Berith Literary and Social Circle, which was announced to take place on Tuesday, August 6th, at the Academy of Music, has been postponed until Wednesday, August 7th. The play of The Marble Heart; or, The Sculptor's Dream will be performed. "Phidias" and "Raphael Duchalet" will be played by Sam Leszynsky, A. Weiner will fill the roles of "Diogenes" and "Volage." Miss Annie Goldstein will perform "Marco," and Miss Augusta Livingstone will appear as "Mario." The entertainments given by this society have always attracted large and fashionable audiences, and the worthiness of the object for which it is given should ensure a good attendance.

THE CITY GARDENS.—Since these beautiful gardens have been thrown open to the public, crowds have flocked thither daily to enjoy a ramble through the shady groves and participate in the many amusements provided. Sailing on the lake is a very favorite pastime, and the two toy steamers are always loaded with passengers. The tame seal is a great pet with the ladies, and all the birds and beasts are rapidly becoming on good terms with their visitors.

WOODWARD'S GARDENS.—The numerons attractions in these delightful pleasure grounds attract crowds of visitors. The gardens never looked more lovely than at the present time, and the conservatories are gay with thousands of rare flowers. The grape honse attracts much attention at present. Grapes in all stages of devlopment may be seen here, and rich bunches of ripe fruit adorn every vine.

ANATOMICAL MUSEUM.—The new models lately added to this splendid collection are well worthy of inspection. Much pleasure, entertainment and instruction may be gained by a visit.

TAX THE BACHELORS.—Buckle's theory that the price of corn regulates the marriage of nations, and consequently their population, seems to be not far wrong. The dullness of the times just now is affecting the matrimonial market, and few marriages are taking place. If Congress would only tax the bachelors, it would improve hymenial products wonderfully. The Romans gave bachelors no legacy. Corinth denied them sepulchre. In Plato's commonwealth, at the age of thirty-five, they were fined. But in this country, so far, no tax has been imposed on them. In Philadelphia there are more homes, in proportion to the popnlation, than in New York or Boston. Hence its superior morality.

WHEN a man wants money or assistance, the world, as a rule, is very obliging and indulgent, and—lets him want it.

THE BOA AND THE RABBIT.

SOME of those industrious persons who use the columns of the Times as a vent for periodical bursts of their indignation have lately discovered a new grievance; it is not a very big one, but it involves some nice points of casuistry. Ought boas in the Zoological Gardens to be allowed live rabbits for dinner? It is of course assumed that they will not eat dead rabbits. With an energy and obstinacy which trade-unionists might envy, they deliberately prefer death by starvation to any deterioration of their daily allowance. We give them full credit for their unflinching courage; but perhaps we ought to warn them that, as in the other cases, their refusal of all compromise must turn out to be suicidal. The boas are doing something far more dangerous than they can at all realize. They are shocking the propriety and the sympathies of the most respectable and tender-hearted people in Europe. They are in danger of summary abolition for the disgusting nature of their tastes. A British public will not stand their epicurean cruelty. They will be stuffed with straw instead of guinea-pigs, and their skins hung up for a perpetual warning, like the heads of traitors over Temple Bar. So perish all animals who dare to commit a breach of the laws of propriety.

A few rather feeble answers have been forwarded by way of apology for the snakes. For example, there is the argument from final causes, which, as is usually the case, rather breaks down. Boas were made to eat rabbits, and we ought not to interfere with the divine arrangements. That is all very well; but, then, what is the office which men were intended to discharge in respect to boas? Would a theological Boa say that men were made in order to exterminate his race, or in order to lock them up in glass-cases and supply them with live rabbits? Probably the boa would consider man in his proper place only when made into food for gigantic snakes, whilst many men would argue that their true functions was to improve all noxious animals off the face of earth. Such questions are too high for us, and, until we are permitted to see further into the inscrutable designs of Providence, we must attempt to solve the problem presented to us from a lower standing-point. We must content ourselves with the utilitarian argument of what is on the whole most improving for the parties concerned—spectators, and their prey.

To take the last first, it would doubtless appear at first sight that the interests of rabbits and boas are as irreconcilably opposed as those of capitalists and laborers; but a fuller examination may in both cases lead us to see that their interests are identical. People who are most ostentatiously kind to animals are not always the greatest benefactors. We fully admit, or rather we most strongly assert, that wanton cruelty to the brute creation ought to be severely punished. Morally speaking, cruelty to animals is an indication of character almost worse than cruelty to men. There is a brutal hardness of disposition displayed in bullying defenceless creatures which is a qualification for the worst crimes; a love of animals, like a love of children, is generally characteristic of the most amiable natures, and its antithesis is one of the most unfavorable symptoms. A boy who begins by torturing a cat is in as fair a road to the gallows as he can very well strike out, and it is long odds that a costermonger who will maltreat his donkey will also beat his wife. We should therefore punish cruelty to the brute creation, in spite of any sneers about sentimentality, both in defence of our dumb dependents, and because it naturally leads to other crimes more serious, if not more disgusting. But, granting all this, the kindness of some persons is rather apt to clear its object out of the world. People forget that, after all, the sheep's friend is the butcher, as the fox's only friend is the sportsman. If beasts are permitted to live on condition of being sent out of the world without unnecessary torture, they make on the whole a very good bargain.

In spite of various aphorisms about "blending our pleasure and our pride with sorrow of the meanest thing that lives," the meanest things not only have a very good time of it in this world, but really find their best friends in their pursuers. The wanton slaughter of beasts for the simple pleasure of slaughter, after Mr. Gordon Cummings' fashion, or the senseless massacre of every rare bird that comes to our shores, is grossly stupid, and exalts indiscriminate killing at the expense of an intelligent pursuit of natural history. But, after all, man's dominion over beasts is founded upon systematic slaughter, and the system is good both for the slayer and the slain, so long as it is exercised with moderation. A true sportsman learns to be humane, and the beast has what beasts ought to have—a short life and a merry one. Hence, if we might be allowed to reason with the guinea-pig, we should point out to him that, if it were not for the boas, the demand for guinea-pigs would fall off by the necessary amount, and consequently the number of guinea-pigs in existence would decline. We should, as sincere friends, recommend him rather to encourage than to prohibit the importation of boas, and to submit to his fate with that decency and courage which becomes men and guinea-pigs who have lived their alloted time in peace and happiness. The would-be defender of his race should pass from the snake-house to the pen where guinea-pigs pass their tranquil existence, and reflect that to destroy the one would imply breaking up the happy home of the others.

But we admit that is only one, and the smallest part of the question. We have to consider the effect upon spectators, and to ask whether, admitting that a sportsman may be humane after putting innumerable beasts to death in a fair fight, a sight-seer can possibly preserve the fine edge of his sensibility who has seen warm-blooded animals engulfed by scaly serpents. War, with all its faults, has something ennobling about it; but no one now argues that it is a good thing to have a taste for executions. And here we must admit that the snakes have at last a universal prejudice weighing against them. There is, it would be useless to deny it, a prevalent objection to snakes.

Exquisitely graceful as are some of their motions, and in some cases their coloring, they somehow disgust people. They have been worshipped in past ages, though that circumstance is not altogether creditable to their characters, but ever since the Book of Genesis was written the weight of opinion has been against them. They are unlucky enough to be the objects of a kind of a theological hatred. The fact that they have to do without legs, and on the whole do remarkably well, should give them a claim upon our compassion; but by an unfortunate inverson, we throw it, so to speak, in their teeth, and taunt them with their unlucky personal peculiarity of having to go upon their bellies and eat dust. There are persons who are superior to this weakness. Mr. Frank Buckland is capable of feeling a personal friendship for a viper, and admitting a cobra to Christian forgiveness for trying to bite him. Such amiable feeling, however, is rare, and is regarded by the majority with a disgust such as is excited by theories of miscegenation.

The snake is to other animals what the nigger is to superior races of humanity. When he eats his rabbit or guinea-pig we feel that the prey belongs to the same order of created beings with ourselves, and his devourer to a lower order. We acknowledge a tie, which is generally weak enough. Instead of considering the rabbit as a possible dinner (though, by the way, a very nasty one), we think of him as more or less a mammal and a brother. As we see the lump which was a rabbit moving slowly down the snake's throat, we feel that sort of loathing which the picœvre excites in the Travailleurs de la Mer. It is the low, slimy organization, belonging to the horrors and tragic influences of creation, which is destroying the higher; chaos and deformity is gaining the upper hand, and we naturally shiver at the process. Yet, admitting that much may be said against snakes, it seems to be really a false sentiment; it amounts to Manicheeism—to the theory that God made the guinea-pig and the Devil the boa-constrictor—a doctrine which we believe to be distinctly heterodox. The snake certainly takes the terrible part of the preaching which we listen to on Sundays at the Zoological Gardens; he suggests to us some of the unpleasant aspects of nature; the hyena does the broad farce; the lion takes the heroic parts, and the elephant the heavy fathers and respectability generally; whilst the serpent comes out as Iago or Richard III. It would be very unreasonable to hate the actors who are kind enough to perform the unpleasant characters, for their expressed sentiments are not really theirs; and it would be equally unreasonable to hate the snakes, for their character is not really immoral.

The Zoological Gardens are certainly one of the most pleasing, and perhaps one of the most improving shows in London. One of their great sources of power is in taking us in imagination away from our streets to the desert or the forest whence the creatures have come. If is a bit of poetry in flesh and blood; and is felt as such by people who do not analyze their emotions, and who would be incapable of appreciating their poetry if taken neat. Now, to remove the serpants would be to take the vinegar out of the salad; we should spoil the harmony by removing the discords; the most effective part of the performance would lose its point if we insisted on representing the villains by dummies stuffed with straw, instead of living and moving creatures. In short, we cling to our snakes; we would as soon have beef without mustard as mere kangaroos and doves with no boa-constrictors. As for the miserable suggestion of stuffed snakes—poor, colorless, motionless, stretched skins—we reject it with contempt. A wild animal in a cage is inferior enough to a wild animal in a forest, but he is infinitely superior to his own skin filled with rubbish. And to make one appeal founded on experience, let us remember how much pleasure the snakes have given within a few years to a discerning public. We say nothing of the cobra who killed the keeper, which was certainly an error on the part of the keeper; but think of the boa who laid the eggs, and of the still more illustrious boa who swallowed the blanket! What other animals, we ask unhesitatingly, have contributed so much to the public amusement? The bulletins about the health of these pleasing creatures excited far more interest than those about the health of any foreign potentate, and gave all London innocent pleasure for weeks. That one blanket should count against thousands of guinea-pigs. And a stuffed boa could neither lay eggs nor swallow blankets.

Hence, in the interest of snakes, rabbits, and spectators equally, we should say it was essential that our snakes should be kept alive; but we admit that the style of eating of the former is not altogether pleasant; and it might be a question, if it is practicable consistently with the good health of the snakes, whether it might not be done at a time when the spectators are absent. On this practical point we pronounce no judgment. It is true that the sight might be nasty for humane people, and bad for children; but why don't humane people keep themselves and their children out of the way? At any rate let us have our snakes, and let them feed in a way as little calculated as possible to shock a public of refined sensibilities. It is a pity that they will not take buns, like almost any other creature known to science; but we see no chance of their accepting so judicious a compromise.—Saturday Review.

LOUIS NAPOLEON.

AT the first glance Louis Napoleon, in his military costume, looked like a mere soldier; his moderate stature and an utter absence of anything like elegance in his carriage did not suggest rank. The light color of his hair and complexion indicate a German origin. A stiff, constrained, undemonstrative air, however appropriate to martial character is essentially the reverse of that which belongs either to the attractive companion or the man of genius. The only trace of the great Corsican was discernable in the manner in which the head is set on the shoulders, or rather the breadth and back inclination of the latter. He moved slowly, but the calm action was less that of habitual dignity than artificial constraint. A more cold face it is difficult to imagine; a remarkable trait of the uncle was a power to discharge his features of all expression; but in the true outline and latent intensity of his extraordinary countenance, this occasional blankness was effective; in the nephew, it does not seem will alone that renders expression inscrutable, but nature. It is next to impossible to catch his eye, which lacks both fire and softness, while a thick brown moustache entirely conceals the lines and workings of the mouth. There is muscle enough, but no tokens of nervous sensibility; the natural language of the face and figure would be heavy, were it not for something sinister and determined obvious in both. His maxim that the lymphatics rule the world, is obviously derived from consciousness. Thus the gait, manner and physiognomy, by their complete want of freedom and vivacity, gave the impression of an actor, which the showy and glittering rooms confirmed; and when he bowed sturdily to some keen-eyed ambassador, took the hand of an old militaire, attempted a wan smile, led out Lady Conway or the Princess Mathilde and walked a quadrille, or seated himself on a divan—acts of play suggested themselves to the imagination; he seemed to be performing the king or duke of an opera, and not quite at home in the part at that, though anxious to be correct even to pedantic formality. It was curious to note the observations in the crowd. "Just the man for France," observed a student; "I saw him dismount at a guard-house last week, courteously take a musket from a soldier's hand, and shoot a bird on the wing. He knows how to make the army love him." "Just the man for France," said one of his physicians; "he does not know what fear means; riding out daily in an open wagon, mingling here with a promiscuous throng—above precaution, though fully aware of danger. The other morning I was in attendance very early. He came out of his chamber, and, for the benfiet of light, took a chair within two feet of the window. As we conversed, a man's head suddenly appeared on the other side of the glass. I could not restrain an exclamation, and instinctively sprang aside—the idea of assassination flashing on my mind. The Emperor never started; or even looked surprised but asked, in his usual tone, 'What do you suppose that fellow wants?' It turned out, when the servants were called, that he was a window cleaner, and, ignorant of which apartments were occupied by his majesty, had set his ladder first against the casement where we were." "He is just the man for France," observed a wealthy lace merchant, wiping the perspiration from his forehead; "see how he has improveed the city. What a splendid street is the Rue Rivoli, and how fast the Louvre is approaching the Tuileries!" "He is just the man for France," repeated a young officer; "how generously he treats us!" and he pointed to an order in his button-hole. "The best ruler we ever had," echoed a pretty woman, daintily arrayed; "how splendid were those fetes, last summer, at St. Cloud, and is not this charming?" "He preserves law and order," said a banker; "trade flourishes." "They are a fickle people and need the curb," remarked an Englishman. "It's Providence," declared a baroness of nobility; "Bonaparte's star is in the ascendant." "It was a question between anarchy and despotism," remarked a journalist. "Everybody is content," said an abbe, "except atheists and authors." "The Faubourg-St. Germain," chimed in a fair denizen of the Chausse d' Autin," is obsolete; the Emperor recognizes merit before birth." "Jamais bal plus beau," announced the next morning's journal, "n'avait eu lieu; les dispositions avaient eté admirablement prises et la fete ordonneé avec un gout parfait. Sa Majesté a danse plusieurs fois."—Tuckerman's Papers about Paris.

MILLINERY AND HEAD-DRESSES.—Mrs. Winship has just received, per last steamer, the latest Parisian Millinery Goods and Laces for HEAD-DRESS, consisting in part of Breakfast Caps, Point Application, Lace Vallenciumes, and the Widow's Rooche, worn by the crown heads of Europe, and the only first imported to the Pacific Coast. Queen Emma, while here, replenished her wardrobe from the stock then and now on hand, at MRS. WINSHIP, No. 23 Post Street, under the Mechanics' Institute. Through the influence of Queen Emma, Mrs. Winship has filled quite a number of orders for the foreign population of Honolulu. The ladies of San Francisco should call and examine these beautiful Goods, by which means they will secure the Latest Fashionable Styles.

MAYER'S BAZAAR.—R. Mayer offers at his Bazaar, corner Pine and Montgomery streets, the greatest variety of jewelry, watches, silver plated ware, guitars, music boxes; concertinas, accordeons, opera glasses, etc., etc., to the public of San Francisco, and to the country trade, at prices that defy competition, and is determined to close out his present stock at greatly reduced rates. His heavy case silver watches from the American Watch Company are superior to anything ever before offered to the public. These watches are taking the place of heavy gold watches from the fact that the workmanship is superior, the casings pure silver, and the prices low. The sale of these watches is very extensive on the Pacific coast. Another proof that American manufactures can beat the world. The works are made of platina and never get out of repair. French opera glasses of great power for sale or hire, and all kinds of musical instruments, eight day family clocks, etc. This is a rare chance to invest your money to advantage, at Mayer's Bazaar, southeast corner of Montgomery and Pine streets.

N. B.—An immense assortment of Japanese curiosities for sale.

ENTOMBMENT OF A BUILDING.—On Friday afternoon, May 10th, a singular and startling accident happened near Girardville, at the foot of Mahanoy Plane, about six miles from Mahanoy City, Schuylkill county, Penn. It seems that at that point a "breast" of the Boston and Mahanoy Coal Company's colliery, had been worked to within abont twenty feet of the surface of the earth, and that located just above it stood a two story frame building occupied by Mr. Thomas T. Myers, a breaker-boss at the colliery, and his family. He also had a number of boarders whose clothing, etc., were in the house. About three o'clock on Friday afternoon, as Mrs. Morris Robinson, wife of the superintendent of the colliery, who was on a visit to the house, and Mrs. Myers were in the kitchen, they felt the house moving and rushed in haste into the open air. Two minutes had hardiy elapsed after they left the house before it sank with a sorging, swaying motion into a huge chasm, to the depth of about eighty feet. Large masses of earth and rock from the sides of the chasm, immediately closed in upon the house burying it almost completely from view. The crash when it went down, was tremendous. The complete entombment of the dwelling which was about thirty-five feet long, may be imagined, says the Miner's Journal, when we state that the chasm formed by the sinking of the mine, would have readily have admitted a building over one hundred feet in length. The house contained seven beds and bedding, four stoves, bureans, and other furniture, besides a considerable quanity of clothing, a Snnday school library and some money. There was fire in several of the stoves, and shortly after the occurrence smoke was seen issuing from the earth which covered the roof, rendering it almost certain that the house had been set on fire. Streams of water were directed into the chasm, and it was hoped that the house would not be entirely destroyed. Fortunately, the startling occurrence was not attented by loss of human life. Had it taken place at night ten lives might have been lost. But it took place in an hour when some of Mr. Myers' children had gone to school, while the others were playing outside.

THE latest style of bonnet has just made its appearance. It is called the "Revenue cutter," and consists of a two cent internal revenue stamp, worn on the head and tied under each ear with a horse-hair. It presents a very pretty appearance at a distance, and must be very comfortable in the warm season of the year.

GRAND TRIAL
....OF....
SEWING MACHINES.

CONTEST BETWEEN THE
FLORENCE AND WILLCOX & GIBBS.

THE
WILLCOX & GIBBS
TRIUMPHANT!

At the Great UNION FAIR, held at Island Park, between Albany and Troy, in September, two Premiums were offered on Sewing Machines, one for the BEST and the other for the "Second Best"—competition being open to the State.

On the first day of the Fair, the Troy Agent of Florence Sewing Machine Company, having, jointly with the Albany Agent of the same Machine, entered it for competition, published in the Troy Daily Times a challenge to Agents of other Sewing Machines, to meet them at said Fair and compete with them for the Premium.

The challenge was accepted by the Troy and Albany Agents of the Willcox and Gibbs Machine.

Each party was to prepare and subject to the judges a "list" of the several "points of merit" on account of which "superiority" was claimed. These "points" were to be separately considered, thoroughly investigated and practically tested, by work done then and there, upon each of the machines; and then decided in favor of the machine which was adjudged to excel on that "point."

Finally it was agreed that the machine which, at the conclusion of the trial, should be found to have the greatest number of those "points" decided in its favor should be decided the "BEST SEWING MACHINE," and awarded the FIRST PREMIUM.

The result of the trial was, that the

WILLCOX & GIBBS WON THE VICTORY

and the prize, by the extraordinary superiority of thirty-five points, decided in its favor, against two points in favor of the Florence.

Full notes were taken of the trial.

It is a fact worthy of remark, that during the entire trial—which continued without intermission for nearly seven hours—not a stitch was missed, nor the thread once broken, nor a needle broken or bent, by the Willcox and Gibbs machine. No kind of work was attempted to be done on it that was not accomplished, and done in a perfect and workmanlike manner; and no effort was made on it that was not entirely successful; while neither of these statements can be truly made in favor of the Florence.

This remarkable trial can not fail, through the facts developed by it, to be productive of important results. It has raised the veil and exposed to public view the true character of the opposition, who will no longer be able to deceive the public by misrepresenting the character and merits of the Willcox and Gibbs machine.

It is an improvement on double thread machines; and its "stitch," which was severely tested by the Judges, was decided to be much stronger and less liable to rip in use or wear than the "Lock Stitch."

It is the simplest in construction—does the greatest variety of work—makes no noise—is not liable to get out of order—costs the least money, and gives the best satisfaction.

☞ Full reports of this trial sent free to any address.

"IF WE KNEW."

If we knew the woe and heart-ache
Waiting for us down the road,
If our lips could taste the wormwood,
If our backs could feel the load;
Would we waste the day in wishing
For a time that ne'er can be;
Would we wait in such impatience
For our ships to come from sea?

If we knew the baby fingers
Pressed against the window pane
Would be cold and stiff to-morrow—
Never trouble us again;
Would the bright eyes of our darling
Catch the frown upon our brow?
Would the print of rosy fingers
Vex us then as they do now?

Ah, those little ice-cold fingers
How they point our memory back
To the hasty words and actions
Strewn along our backward track!
How those little hands remind us,
As in snowy grace they lie,
Not scatter thorns—but roses—
For our reading by and by!

Strange we never prize the music
Till the sweet-voiced bird has flown;
Strange that we should slight the violets
Till the lovely flowers are gone;
Strange that Summer skies and sunshine
Never seemed one-half so fair
As when Winter's snowy pinions
Shake the white down in the air!

Lips from which the seal of silence
None but God can roll away
Never blossomed in such beauty
As adorns the mouth to-day;
And sweet words that freight our memory
With their beautiful perfume,
Come to us in sweet accents,
Through the portals of the tomb.

Let us gather up the sunbeams
Lying all along our path;
Let us keep the wheat and roses,
Casting out the thorns and chaff;
Let us find our sweetest comfort
In the blessings of to-day;
With a patient hand removing
All the briars from our way.

AYER'S
AGUE CURE,

FOR THE SPEEDY CURE OF

Intermittent Fever, or Fever and Ague, Remittent Fever, Dumb Ague, Periodical Headache, or Bilious Fevors, indeed for the whole Class of Diseases originating in Biliary Derangement, Caused by the Malaria of Miasmatic Countries.

No one remedy is louder called for by the necessities of the American people than a sure and safe cure for Fever and Ague. Such we are now enabled to offer, with a perfect certainty that it will eradicate the disease, and with assurance founded on proof, that no harm can arise from its use in any quantity.

That which protects from or prevents this disorder must be of immense service in the communities where it prevails. Prevention is better than cure, for the patient escapes the risk which he must run in violent attacks of this baleful distemper. This "Cure" expels the miasmic poison of Fever and Ague from the system, and prevents the development of the disease, if taken on the first approach of the premonitory symptoms. It is not only the best remedy ever yet discovered for this class of complaints, but also the cheapest. The large quantity we supply for a dollar brings it within reach of every body, and in the bilious districts, where Fever and Ague prevails, everybody should have it and use it freely both for cure and prevention. A great superiority of this remedy over any other ever discovered for this speedy and certain cure of Intermittents is, that it contains no Quinine or mineral, consequently it produces no quinism or other injurious effects whatever upon the constitution. Those cured by it are left as healthy as if they had never had the disease.

Fever and Ague is not alone the consequence of the miasmatic poison. A great variety of disorders arise from its irritation, among which are Neuralgia, Rheumatism, Gout, Headache, Blindness, Toothache, Earache, Catarrh, Asthma, Palpitation, Painful Affection of the Spleen, Hysterics, Pain in the Bowels, Colic, Paralysis, and Derangement of the Stomach, all of which, when originating in this cause, put on the intermittent type, or become periodical. This "Cure" expels the poison from the blood, and consequently cures them all alike.

Prepared by DR. J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, and sold by all Druggists, everywhere.

TO THE UNFORTUNATE.

NEW REMEDIES! NEW REMEDIES!

Dr. Gibbon's Dispensary.

ESTABLISHED IN 1854,
616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco.

For the treatment of Sexual and Seminal Diseases, such as gonorrhœa, gleet, stricture, syphilis in all its forms, seminal weakness, impotency, &c. Skin Diseases, (of years' standing,) and Ulcerated legs, successfully treated.

HORRIBLE DISEASES.

How many thousands of persons both male and female are there who are suffering out a miserable existence from the effects of secret indulgence, or from virus absorbed into the system. Look at their pallid, emaciated and disfigured faces, and their broken constitutions, disqualifying them for the happiness of marriage or the enjoyment of life. In this horrid situation thousands suffer until death closes the scene. Let parents, guardians and friends, attend to those who are suffering with any of these horrible, life-destroying maladies—see that they are cared for and cured before it be too late. Send them to Dr. Gibbon, a physician who has made private diseases his especial study for years, and who is certain to cure the most inveterate cases without mercury or any injurious drugs. It is important to those who are afflicted, to be careful of the many pretended Doctors who infest all cities, publishing their skill in curing all diseases in a few days, imposing upon the public by using the names of eminent physicians from Europe and other places. Be therefore careful and make strict inquiry, or you may fall into the hands of these charlatans.

Syphilis is syphilis the world over; so is small pox, consumption, and other diseases, to the contrary of what quacks may say.

SEMINAL WEAKNESS.

Seminal weakness the consequent of self abuse. This solitary vice, or depraved sexual indulgence, is practiced by the youth of both sexes to an almost unlimited extent, producing with unerring certainty the following train of morbid symptoms, unless combatted by scientific medical measure; sallow countenances, dark spots under the eyes, pain in the head, ringing in the ears, noise like the rustling of leaves and rattling of chariots, uneasines about the loins, weakness of the limbs, confused vision, blunt intellect, loss of confidence, diffidence in approaching strangers, a dislike to form new acquaintances, a disposition to shun society, loss of memory, hectic flushes, pimples and various eruptions about the face, furred tongue, fetid breath, coughs, consumption, night sweats, monomania, and frequent insanity. If relief be not obtained, should apply immediately, either in person or by letter, and have a cure effected by his new and scientific mode of treating this complaint, which never fails of effecting a quick and radical cure. Dr. G. will give $100 to any person who will prove satisfactorily to him that he was cured by either of the San Francisco quacks.

Dr. Gibbon is responsible, and will give each patient a written instrument binding himself to effect a radical and permanent cure or make no charge.

Persons at a distance may be cured at home by addressing a letter to Dr. Gibbon, stating case, symptoms, length of time the disease has continued, and have medicine promptly forwarded, free from damage and curiosity, to any part of the country, with full and plain directions for use, for ten dollars, sent in a registered letter, or through Wells, Fargo & Co.

Address DR. J. F. GIBBON, 616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco, Postoffice Box 252.

CAUTION TO THE UNFORTUNATE.

Beware of the San Francisco quacks and pretenders who with bogus sworn-to certificates, dupe the unwary. Some of the self-styled doctors whose names are to be found in all the daily and weekly papers of San Francisco and other places, are tradesmen, and become too lazy to work at their trade. Some are tinsmiths, shoemakers, newspaper carriers, intelligence offices keepers, etc. Look over the San Francisco City Directory and you will find their former occupation in it. Look at the Directory for 1862-63. The only way to avoid imposition is make inquiry—it will cost you nothing and may save you many regrets, for advertising physicians in eight cases out of ten are hogus, there is no safety in trusting any of them till you know who and what they are. Dr. Gibbon does not deceive people by exhibiting bogus titles, certificates, pretended patients' letters, etc. Dr. Gibbon Will satisfy persons who may call at his office of his ability to treat diseases that he proposes to cure.

☞ Persons writing to Dr. Gibbon will Please state the name of the paper they see his advertisement in.

BABBITTONIAN,

OR SELF-TEACHING

PENMANSHIP!

The System of Babbitonian Penmanship is pre-eminently self-instructing. With its ample explanations of right and wrong forms—its sixty wood cuts—its plain intelligent rules, one may sit down by his own fireside and become a finer Penman than he could at much greater cost in the usual way with a living teacher.

There is a great demand for fine Penmen in the commercial world, and this system, at a trifling expense, imparts a skilful command of the Pen, worth hundreds of dollars to the fortunate possessor.

Penmanship is an indispensable accomplishment to Ladies, and this system is elaborate in a series of elegant copies in the Ladies' Style.

Business men have sometimes lost thousands of dollars from ignorance in regard to Business forms, and there is furnished in a set, without additional charge, a fine variety of Business Forms and Abbreviations. To sum up the Excellencies of this System, it is—

1—Scientific in its Arrangement of Principles;
2—Artistic in its Movements and Flourishes;
3—Practical in its Combinations and Applications;
4—Stylish in its neat and chaste Gracefulness;
5—Superior for Legibility, Rapidity and Beauty;
6—Most Disciplinary for fingers, Arms and Muscles.
7—Unexcelled for Comprehensiveness and Simplicity.
8—Complete and Self-Teaching for Private Learners;
9—Time, Labor and Expense Saving for Pupils and Teachers.

The Babbitonian Penmanship

Is published on durable card-board slips, ninety-two copies illustrated, put in a neat package with a Chart, the whole complete at the low price of $1 50.

Babbittonian Pens.

One reason why the country is flooded with poor Pens is that they are generally made by mechanics, rather than by artistic and experienced Penmen, the only parties really understanding the requirements of a good article.

The Babbittonian Pens,

Made in the most finished style, by skilful artisans, after models prepared according to the combined wisdom and experience of several amateurs and old Professors of Penmanship, are admirably adapted to meet the public wants.

The Babbittonian Ladies' Pen,

Is one of the most exquisite little instruments for delicate writing ever constructed.

The Babbittonian Extra Fine Pen,

Is pronounced by a large number of Penmen to be more free, more durable, and more varied in capacity for either fine or coarse strokes than any foreign Pen whatever. Suitable for elegant writing, it is a great favorite with the ladies and gentlemen.

The Babbittonian Business Pen,

Having great freedom and variety of movement, is unequaled for general business or school purposes. Somewhat coarser than the Extra Fine, it wears longer and moves more easily on paper.

☞ This Pen is now in use in the large counting-houses and banks in this city.

A RARE GEM OF ART.

"The Lord's Prayer,"

A pen drawing, by Mr. D. F. Brown, is one of the most remarkable works of art ever exhibited in this country. By patient labor he has succeeded in producing a design which for skill and beauty of execution, exquisite softness and delicacy of finish, and general merit, it would seem scarcely possible to surpass. The central figure—the face of our savior—is one of marvelous power and beauty. This and the faces of the Twelve Apostles, forming the border of the piece, are faithful copies from Leonardo da Vinci's famous painting of the

LAST SUPPER,

Re-producing, with the softest and most perfect shadings, the conceptions and characteristic expressions of the originals. Within this enclosure the words of the Lord's Prayer, in ornamental letters of various original designs and exquisite finish, are an interesting study of art in themselves; while appropriately distributed among these, miniture groups and scenes of marked events of Savior's life, copied from the great masters—five of them from Raphel's celebrated designs—form a harmonious completion of this unique, beautiful and truly wonderful work. The faces of

OUR LORD AND HIS APOSTLES.

Alone, so finely copied, would be a treasure in any house, and worth the full price of subscription.

TO THE LEGAL VOTERS OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

☞ Prompted alike by a sense of duty to myself and to the public, and in compliance with the request of several hundred citizens, taxpayers, and friends of the Public Schools, representing the different political sentiments, religious creeds, nationalities and classes of the San Francisco community, I hereby announce myself an independent Candidate, at the approaching election, for the office of Superintendent of Public Schools. In so doing, I deem it proper to say that I do not thereby appeal from the decision of any party or convention, but simply think it a matter of right, and, under the circumstances, eminently fit to refer the subject of my candidacy directly to the people, the parties really interested; and, I think I may properly solicit, and with reason expect, the continued support of the friends of education, and that of all others who think I have faithfully and usefully discharged my duties during the past two years, in the office to which I seek re-election.

I am induced to ask your support, and the more readily comply with the wishes of personal friends, and the friends of our Public Schools, in becoming a candidate, since I am invited to do so "without respect to political considerations, which it is thought should be disregarded in the choice of school officers." Having devoted the best years of my life to the education of the young and to the interests of this city and the State in that connection, I feel it but just to myself and to the public which I have served, if success has attended my labors, that I should not be thrown out of a position of public usefulness and from needed employment, for no better reason than that another, however competent, wants my position, and seeks to be placed on it through preliminary political management and the discipline of a party organization. Such others as think with me in that respect, and believe a change of officers in the position I occupy is uncalled for at the present time, and that my re-election would subserve the interests of the Public School Department of this city, are respectfully requested to give utterance to that effect by casting their votes for me at the approaching election.

Profoundly thankful for your generous support in a former election, I remain respectfully,

J. C. PELTON.

San Francisco, July 29th, 1867.

A CARD TO THE PUBLIC.

BELIEVING that my fidelity to the Government of the United States is entirely beyond question, and that no political issue is necessarily involved in the selection of the local officers of this city and county; knowing that great dissatisfaction with the manner in which party Conventions have been manipulated and controlled, and with the results of their action during the present year, is felt and expressed throughout the community; having been assured by representatives of every class of our citizens with whom I have been brought in contact, that the manner in which I have discharged my duties during the present year, is felt and expressed throughout the community; having been assured by representatives of every class of our citizens with whom I have been brought officially into contact, that the manner in which I have discharged my duties during the ten years that I have been successively connected with every department of the Shrievalty, and especially during the three years that I have been at the head of that office, is an ample guarantee for my fitness and usefulness; preferring not to embarrass myself by any pledges which, in the event of my election, might interfere with the fair and just administration of the duties of that important branch of the city government, but relying solely upon the public and private reputation which I may have had the good fortune to acquire; I beg respectfully to offer myself as an independent candidate for the position of Sheriff at the coming Municipal election, and to ask the suffrages of the public in my behalf.

THE EMPTY SLEEVE.

I WANT no pity, ask no alms;
Give me some work for this one hand;
The other, 'neath the Southern palms,
Is rotting in the shining sand.
I left a home, a child, a wife,
As dear to me as yonrs to yon,
And freely offered up my life,
To aid a cause I knew was trne;
And so, my friend, with your good leave,
No pity for this empty sleeve.

I could not rest in idle ease,
And rend of fiery deeds each day;
Althongh she, weeping, clasped my knees,
And earnest plend that I might stay.
"Dear heart," I said, "with steel and ball,
Beneath the banner of the free
I'll take my chance, for should it fall,
What would be my home to me
Without the flag whose sacred dyes
Are pictured in God's lovely skies?"

Begrimmed by smoke and torn by shell,
But each star standing in its pluce,
More holy for the hearts that fell,
To shield it from disgrace;
It waves in glory once aguin,
As in the bright old days before
Its honored folds received the strain
Of kindred blood at Baltimore—
Ere that old emblem sunk. believe,
I'd wish a shroud to wrap this sleeve.

When the keen saw rasped through the bone,
From my pale lips there hurst a cry;
'Twas not the stinging pain alone
That caused that moan of agony:
But thoughts of home smote on my bruin—
Good reason had I to deplore—
For 'gainst two hands the wolf will gain
Oft' times a seat at Labor's door;
How should I then their wants relieve—
A soldier with an empty sleeve?

"Nay, don't despair; take courage, lad,"
The busy surgeon kindly suid;
"Be sure, to lose an arm is bad,
But better 'tis than lose your head;
Why, all our tongues love well to wag
Of color-sergeant Richurd Todd,
Whose arm was first to plant onr flag
Above grim Wagner's smoking sod;
Think of the glory, man, don't grieve,
You are doubly paid for the empty sleeve."

But glory will not fill the hands,
Of those who wait at home for bread;
Upon our hearth a spectre stands,
That fills our hearts with dread.
Seeking for work day after day,
And gaining naught but cold replies;
At night I see her turn away
To hide the tears that fill her eyes,
And almost wish death might relieve
My paiu, as I toy with the empty sleeve.

Daily are places filled by those
Who cursed the cause for which I bled,
Two years ago our deadliest foes,
Now on the public bonnty fed.
Must we who breasted rebel steel,
And bore "Old Glory" through the land,
Now ask of passers-by a meal,
Abject and humble, hat in hand?
Republic, can you thus disgrace
The hearts that held you in your place?

Does it not tell of hardships passed—
This useless swinging sleeve of mine?
Dread marches in December's blast,
In pelting rain and shiue;
Of glory fields and ghastly slain,
Whose faces make the senses reel,
And maim'd men shrieking in their pain,
Where thundering squadrons churge and wheel;
Whose fierce hoofed steeds, in the wild strife,
Crushed out the little left of life.

For what is past I yet can say,
I cherished not one vuin regret;
Do not, then, make me curse the day
My old blue coat with blood was wet;
Spare me your pity, if you please,
And give me work for this one hund;
The other 'neath the green palm trees,
Is rotting in the shifting sand;
O, grand Repnblic, give me leave
To proudly flaunt this empty sleeve.

Political Fluctuations.

We find things political so peculiarly muddled, that though laudably anxious to make a little money, or a pair of boots, or a hat, or some addition to our wardrobe ont of rash and unwary individuals possessing a smaller share of political perspicocity than ourself, we have found the task attended by serious and perplexing embarassments.

When Gorham was nominated, we considered him of "no account." The Bulletin asked, "who is this Geo. C. Gorham any way?"

This impressed us profoundly. Constitutionally, and by education, we are "respectable." Consequently, we have a huge respect for the Bulletin, which is nothing, if not "respectable." Accordingly we spoke of "little Georgy" on the streets, as a most preposterous candidate. He Governor of California forsooth! He, u mere private secretary to "His Accidency," as Frank Pixley used irreverently to characterize one of the most dignified gentlemeu that ever filled the gnbernatorial chair. He candidate for governor! O, pshaw! It's too ridiculous. Besides, the Bulletin says, (and we can't help being impressed by the Bulletin, it's so respectable) that Gorham is a very naught, fellow, a "manipulator," a "lobbyist" etc., etc., and of course the enlightened people of California will never vote for "manipulation" und a "lobbyist." That's the way we thought and talked. We thought Gorham's goose was cooked and suid so. One day—on Montgomery street, where we were looking ont eagerly for some green Gorhamite whom we might devour, we unexpectedly struck him in the shape of a country editor. Of course he was green—all country editors are. His nume is De Long, A. A. De Long of the Woodland Messenger, or the Woodville News, or the Woodbridge Messenger or News (wo can't remember which—there are so many of those country papers you know, that it requires quite an effort to keep run of 'em.) Well, this verdant provincial, scemed to have a sort of simple child-like faith in Gorham, and we saw that he was our meat. So we hantered him for a het, and made a suit of clothes out of him, poor fellow!—that is, we shall when the election is over, and Huight or Fay is elected, which all the respectable and influential pupers, including the Bulletin, Union, und Call say is a sure thing.

Well, a few days afterwards, as we were perambulating Montgomery street, stopping at all the corners where the local statesmen were "hnzzing," and all the while keeping a sharp look ont for Gorham greenies, with the enterprising hope of supplementing our new suit with a hat and a pair of boots at the expense of the enemy, we met Upson, formerly of the Sacramento Union, and now occupying the herth (more bonorahle and responsible than lucrative) of Survey or General of this gorgeous golden State. Upson, is generally supposed to be pretty well posted on onr State politics; and we hud long been accustomed to regard him as an old Nester who "knew it all." So we told him what a good thing we had on De Long—how we had taken advantage of the Woodville, or Woodland, or Woodbridge editor's simplicity, and "struck him" for a sixty dollar suit of Sunday dry goods. Old Upson, however, didn't seem to see things from onr point of view. He didn't appear to feel qnite as sorry for the country editor as we had expected. In fact, he rather intimated that in his opinion the boot was on the other leg, or rather, that the "store clothes" pertained to the other man. He commenced talking figures and statistics (things we never had any genius for) told us what the Republican majority was at the last State election (what the d—l did we care about the last election? how many votes the sore heads were likely to draw away from Gorham; how this thing and that thing, and the other thing was likely to work, and wound up by telling us that "in his opinion" the little lobbyist would carry the State. "by from five to nine thousand majority." We now began to feel rather faint; went up to Weston's, on Jackson street, took a look at those young canaries without feet refreshed ourself with a glass of "Old Rye," met a Haight man who wanted to bet u pair of sixteen dollar boots that his candidate would carry the State; thought it best to hedge, and took him up. We then cruised around to Stapleton's where we saw the Bar-room Statesman, who demonstrated that the interior was full of sore heads, and that Gorhum hadn't a living show. Took divers glasses of lager, and concluded that we had been rash in hedging, and bet an eight dollar hat and a gold-headed cane on Gorham. Stopped in at Marton & Horton's and took a whisky punch with a delegate to the "National Republiian Convention," who convinced us that Haight would carry the State, and Fay come in second best. Went out and met a Gorham man on the corner, and wagered a month's salary that Haight would be next Governor. Looked in at the Bank Exchange, and took something with Harry Baker and Zeke Wilson, who proved that Gorham was bound to carry the State hy from twelve to fifteen thousand majority. Took something more, made more bets. Went somewhere else; took something else; bet something or other; went to bed somewhere, and woke up in a strange place in the morning, without any small change to pay for our breakfast. Walked out and posted ourself on the corner of Montgomery and Clay streets. Stopped the first Gorham man that came along and borrowed two and a half. Chuckled at the idea of levying on the enemy. Went to the Rotisserie, and meditated over our eggs and coffee, on the fluctuatione of things political.

Ben Nickerson's Face.

Ben Nickerson got into a terrible rage on Tuesday evening, at the National Republican Convention, because the reporter of the Alta had, in speaking of him, said that he possessed mobile features. He said;

"Whether my face is mobile or not, or whether it is phlegmatic or, if you like, saturnine, or cadaverous, it is no concern of yours. It is the best face that the Almighty God saw fit co give me. If he had given me a had given me a handsomer one I might not be proud of it, but if I had stch a convict face as that one over the way—If I hud such a face as that I would imitate the example of Judas, and go out into thto a field and hang myself."

Whatever may be the quality or quantity of Ben Nickerson's face all must confess that he showed considerable cheek in daring to thus assail u member of the Press. We move that a public meeting be called to decide which is the homeliest Ben Nickerson or the reporter of the Alta, u horse collar for them to grin through, to be provided at the expense of the Republican National Convention. Then let the one who is the worst looking follow the example of Judas Iscariot.

A New Paddy's Land.

In the highly interesting article on Japan, which appears on another page, we find reference made to "lovely valleys clothed with the waving cotton plant or the still lovelier green of the Paddy." It appears from this that there is no law in Japan to prevent Paddy from "wearing of the green," and no doubt a large immigration of Paddies will take place in Japan. We notice that many of the Paddies who come to this country partake of the hue of their native isle—that their greenness is really delightful—but alas! they soon get over it. As it is impossible for every Irishman in the United States to obtain an office we would suggest that disappointed candidates go to Japan and undertake the management of the government in thut country.

Pious Old Gentleman.

All right minded men must grieve and lament, with tears in their eyes, the fact that General Bidwell has declined the nomination which was never tendered him. That sweet and touching letter of his must have caused many a case-hardened and pity-proof Democrat to waver in his faith. What a noble example does General Bidwell set before the selfish politicians who seek merely to gratify their lust of power and of gain! He says; "As far as I am concerned, I am trytrying to lay aside all personal feelings and considerations. In fact, I have done so as far as human nature is capable of under similar circumstances. I profess not to be perfect." He profosses not to be perfect. Ah! but he is—or very nearly so. If ever there was a blessed saint on earth, Governor Bidwell is one.

A Great Relief.

The city of San Francisoo was plunged into grief last week in consequence of the unreliable reporters of the daily press having stated that Mrs. Blitz, the wife of "the active and energetic police officer Blitz," who engages cabmen in single combat ut the risk of his life, and exercises a supervision over the Supervisors, died on board the steamship Montana on her way to this port from New York. The public were much relieved when the next day the reporters announced that instead of Mrs. Blitz, the wife of the aforesnid policeman Mrs. E. A. Bliss, of Troy, was the person who died. There was no sympathy for Mr. Bliss, and but few shed tears over the death of an accomplished lecturer and talented woman. Truly it is a high honor to be a policeman's wife!

An Ungrateful Farmer.

An exchauge says: "A farmer living near Iowa Falls had twenty hogs killed by lightning on the 14th. The saddest part of the story is, that he had been fattening them on corn worth $1 50 a bushel." If the hogs were fat there is nothing very sad in tho lightning having killed them. The farmer was saved the trouble of slaughtering them, and should have been grateful for the lightening of his labors. If any object that hogs killed by lightning are unwholesome, we ask, "have they ever eaten hogs so blasted?" The time may come when electricity may be employed in all slaughter houses as the most humane method of dispatching animals.

A Literary Sharpshooter.

While the majority of the daily papers actively engaged in the political campaign advance ponderous columns against those to whom they are opposed, the Flag adopts a more effective mode of attack. Its editor is an accomplished literary sharpshooter, und picks off a man or two every day with a well directed shot. A politician often experiences more damage from being peppered with half a dozen stinging paragraphs than from a savage leaded leader;

BEN SERRAQ.

THE French-Algerian magistrate's chaouch or sheriff's-officer, Djilali by name, was recovering a little from the out-of-countenance condition into which he had been thrown by his failure in giving a miraculous turn to the embezzlement of a couple of sacks of wheat from the backs of a pair of donkeys: he straightened his back, stood stiff on his legs, and abruptly entered with ineffable seal on the discharge of his functions as chief constable and crier-of-the-court. He was an eight day clock wound up again, when just at the point of running down and coming to a stop, As he opened and shut the police-room doors with the loudest bangings and clappings—shouting for the plaintiffs to appear, and hustling everybody who stood in his way as he swaggered about the antechamber—the assembly present, still impressed with the sack and donkey scene they had witnessed, whispered from mouth to mouth and from ear to ear that, in the memory of mekrazeni, so accomplished a chaouch had never been seen,

Suddenly, a confused noise was heard out of doors. As it approached, the sounds grew louder; and at last the ear could distinguish the most energetic oaths in the Arab language, and the music which proceeds from fisticuffs and kicks when applied to divers parts of the human body. Djilali's voice rose above the tumult, and his stick accompanied the melody of his voice. Finally the door opened and a group of men, singularly interlaced together, rolled into, rather than entered, the room. When Djilali, by a succession of the most skillful movements, had succeeded in putting a little restraint and order into this tempestuous storm of arms and legs, the eye could manage to distinguish a group of five men, four of whom had quite enough to do to enforce on the fifth a little respect. The last named worthy was of lofty statue and vigorously limbed. His garments torn to shreds, and his sorry face attested participation in a recent struggle; but his hands tied behind his back and fastened by a rope to his neck, were evidence that he had not been victorious. His companions held him fast with a degree of caution which showed that even in the state to which he was reduced, they were not quite sure he would not make his escape. Four rope's-ends, which dangled from his wrists and his neck, were tightly grasped with exaggerated uneasiness and tenacity. Scarcely had the five new-comers subsided into calmness, when an unanimous exclamation arose from the midst of the audience, "'Tis Ben Serraq! What has he been doing now?"

M. Richards, the presiding magistrate, inquired, somewhat severely:

"What has the man done, that you should bring him bound in that cruel way?"

"'Tis Ben Serraq!" was the answer he received from the quartette of voices.

"Ah, Ben Serraq! A professional robber belonging to the Sefhha, is he not?"

"The very same!' said the Coryphæus of the associated plaintiffs.

"Yes, sure enough; 'tis I, Ben Serraq," growled the prisoner, in a voice which reminded you of a wild beast roaring at night.

"But I was informed that he had amended his mode of life, and that lately he has been living at peace with his neighbors?"

"I have always lived at peace with my neighbors. I am a good Mussulman, fearing Allah and the law. I am calumniated.,'

"Hold your tongue," said the court, "and do not speak till you are spoken to."

"It is true." explained the plaintiff number one, 'that, for some time past, he has let us be quiet, and only committed distant robberies; but a few days since, he stole one of our bullocks."

"Sidi Bou Krari!" roared the savage. "How dare they slander a poor innocent creature like me in that way?"

"But is the fact clearly proved?" the president inquired. "How did it occur?"

"It is plain as can be," said plaintiff number two. "There is not the least doubt about the matter."

"That's what you get by serving the French!" muttered Ben Serraq, with the air of a Cato. "What ingratitude, gracious Allah, Lord of the universe!"

At this juncture, Djilali received orders to prevent the accused, by any means whatever, from making lengthy interruptions to the recital of the plaintiffs' wrongs. As to short exclamations that will break forth, the chaouch might allow them to burst from their safety-valve, seeing the material impossibility of confining them within the lips of a subject like the present defendant.

"Come, then," said the court decidedly, "one of you explain the business."

"Don't mind what they say," Ben Serraq roared out. 'They are liars. They have a spite against me!"

"As I said just now," the complainant stated, "the case is plain. Our herds were grazing in the neighborhood of Ben Serraq's tent. On driving them home in the evening we discovered that a bullocks was missing. My brethren and myself immediately took the field, to discover some trace of the robbery, but we could discover nothing. At last, after several days of fruitless search, it entered into our heads to have a look at Ben Serraq's tent. We had suspected him, in consequence of what had happened some months previously.'

"Barbarians!" yelled the untamed innocent; "to violate the tent of an honest Mussulman!"

"But we had no need to enter it; which, moreover, we should not have done without the kaids authorisation."

"Quite right," said the magistrate, approvingly.

"We met his wife as she was coming from the water."

"What an abomination?" howled the biped brute; "to stop a woman on the road?"

"And who, for the promise of trifling reward, told us the whole affair."

"A capital witness—a she-beggar, who betrays me!"

"She explained that it was her husband that stole our bullock, in order to provide himself with a store of salt meat."

"Sidi Bou Krari! That a woman should lie like that!"

"She then showed us several goat-skins filled with the meat."

"As if a Mussulman were not allowed to keep salted meat in his tent!"

"And, to remove all doubt as to where the meat came from, she showed us the bullock's head lying in one corner of the tent, still in a state sufficiently preserved to enable us to recognise the animal."

"What a horrible she-vagabond! But her evidence is good for nothing; I had given her a beating not two days before."

"Our only thought then was to seize the wild-boar who is now before you. There was the difficulty; for this son of Satan is as strong as no one else, and can knock down a camel with a blow of his fist."

"What a joke! I am as mild as a sheep."

"Twenty of us met in company, and at dawn of day, informed by his wife—"

"What a pity I did not strangle her, as I meant to!"

"Informed by his wife that he was still asleep, we rushed down upon him; and, after a hard struggle, contrived to bind him in the way you see, as he lay on his mat."

"Sidi Abd-Allah! What treachery! To attack a good Mussulman as he lay asleep!"

"And a good thing it was that we did attack him in that way; for, although he was hardly awake, he managed, while he was wrestling with us, to break one of Olid Sekrad's legs, and to put out one of Ali Oud Ama's eyes. He smashed in five or six of poor Bou Senan's teeth, and bit Otsman Oud Messassit's back savagely."

"Justice of the Master of the World! is it possible to lie in this way? On the contrary, I have been half killed by you. Don't you see my face is covered with blood?"

"Son of a dog! you well know the blood is from poor Oud Messassit's body."

"Sidi Abd-Allah!" exclaimed Ben Serraq. But it was no use invoking the saints. Djilali called for a towel and a basin of water, and with them washed Ben Serraq's face. The experiment established the fact that that interesting individual had not received the slightest scratch. and that the bite on unfortunate Oud Messassit's back must have been the only source of the stains."

"Well, Ben Serraq," said the president; "although I cannot entertain any reasonable doubt of your guilt, you are nevertheless, at liberty to speak—let us hear what you have to say in justification."

"Ah! I am allowed to explain! Well; you will soon see! In the first place my wife is a she-vagabond—everybody knows it, don't they Djilali?"

"But Djilali, who was particularly anxious to conceal all cognisance of the defendant's affairs only replied—"May your tent catch fire! Pray what connection have I ever had with you, that I should know how your wife employs herself?"

"Very well; 'tis of no consequence. But, the fact is notorious and incontestible—the she-dog betrays my honour."

"I will take your word for it," said the court; "and then!—

"She has taken a fancy to Oud Rai, whose people's shepherds have treated me so shamefully. I have often said to her, 'Fatima. my darling, things cannot go on in this manner; your improper conduct sets everybody talking, and a modest and virtuous man, like myself, will soon be the laughing-stock of the whole country, and that on your account. Mind what you are about, else I shall be obliged to beat you; and you are aware, my beloved, that when I do hit, I hit rather hard."

"But I do not see what reference your matrimonial tribulations have to the business now before us."

"I beg your pardon—you will see directly. I admonished her, therefore, with the utmost gentleness, in accordance with my natural disposition. But it was a waste of time and breath. She persevered in her infamous conduct till I was obliged, as a gentleman, to administer to her and the Oud Rai, one day, a considerable number of kicks and thumps."

"But again I ask, what have these details to do with the theft of which you stand accused? Explain yourself more clearly."

"What, cannot a man of your great genius see now, how things have been managed?"

"I have an idea I can; but probably not in the same light as you do."

"What! don't you see that Oud Rai and my wretch of a wife, to be avenged of the beating I gave them, have subtracted the bullock in question without my knowledge, and have cut it up in my tent, in order to compromise me with the authorities! Sidi Bou Krari! it is as clear as the sun, that Don't you see that I am a virtuous husband calumniated by a criminal wife?"

A subdued murmur, mingled with stifled laughter arose in the assembly at the victim air which Ben Serraq tried hard to assume, and also at listening to the singular pleading which he had improvised.

"Ben Serraq," said the magistrate in a sceptical tone, your case must be a very bad one, to compel you to employ such poor arguments for its defence. How could your wife play you such a trick as you describe without your knowledge, since your accusers found your tent filled with the animal's remains, the head particularly being so conspicuous and recognisable an object?"

"What is there extraordinary in that?" asked Ben Serraq, not in the slightest degree disconcerted. "My wife is so artful, and I am so simple and innocent, that she could easily contrive to conceal the matter."

"Come; these are wretched arguments. For a man like you, who has had so many transactions with the authorities, it is not a clever way to get out of a scrape."

"I invoke Allah and his justice!" screamed Ben Serraq with the throat of a wild boar. "I am a poor persecuted innocent; there is nothing proved against me, absolutely nothing. The case at least is doubtful,—that is incontestible,—and in cases of doubt the law requires me to take an oath. Put me on my oath; I will swear on the Koran, on Sidi Bou Krari, on whatever book you please, I am as innocent as a suckling."

No doubt. You will take a hundred oaths as readily as one. But unfortunately for you, I have not forgotten your previous character, and must consider the charge as completely established."

"Allah! Lord of the Universe! Justice is not to be had in this country."

"Honest men will say to the contrary, when they hear you are caught, and especially when they see you transported to France: whither I intend requesting you to be sent."

"That's the reward people get for serving the French!" swaggered Ben Serraq, as Coriolanus might have done when banished by ungrateful Rome.

"Not bad by my faith! You doubtless consider that you are rendering people a service by easing them of their purses."

"I have been of service to you in time of warfare, by marching constantly at the head of your columns."

"True; you have sometimes marched at the head of our columns as a guide; but most assuredly you insisted on heavy wages, as far as I can recollect. Besides, that is no reason why you should be allowed in recompense, to plunder the whole human race. You ought to have reformed, as you promised you would, and then we should have forgotten the past."

"I am slandered! I am a victim!"

"Retain that idea for your consolation, and hold your tongue. Djilali, take some of the men on guard and lead this fellow to prison."

"Sidi, Sidi!" pleaded Ben Serraq, "can you not deliver me from these bonds, which give me horrible pain?"

"Very well; I will. Djilali, unfasten the ropes, which, in fact, are a little too tight. It is impossible for him to make his escape now; only, take some of the cavalry with you, and keep a sharp eye on him on the way to prison."

"O, Sidi! such precautions are unnecessary. I am as gentle as a lamb." And Ben Serraq made his exit escorted by a numerous suite of mekrazenis, at the head of whom was Djilali, and who feeling the greatness of his responsibility, marched as if he were carrying the world. But an Arab chief in alliance with the French, named Ben Safi, whispered to the president as soon as the prisoner had disappeared.

"Perhaps you were wrong to let his arms be untied."

"That is rather good," the magistrate replied. "How do you suppose, can he contrive to escape from the custody of ten soldiers, and in the midst of the town?"

"I have seen him escape," Ben Safi explained, "under circumstances that would make one believe there was something diabolical in his composition. One night when he had the impudence to come and rob in my own smala, we contrived to seize him by killing the horse he had stolen from us, and under which it chanced that he was caught as it fell. I had his hands tied behind his back, and ordered one of my men to kill him like a dog from behind, with a pistol-shot. The shot was fired; but my gentleman instead of dropping down dead as he ought to have done, jumped up as lively as a grasshopper, and disappeared as if a flash of lightning had carried him off. The bullet had only cut the chords which bound him, and had been flattened on the palm of his hand. We were stupefied with astonishment."

"And well you might be!" said the official head of the Arab bureau, beginning to feel a little fidgety. "I now believe I should have acted more prudently if I had forbidden his being unpinioned till he was safely lodged in prison."

"I am sure you would;" interposed Ben Tekrouide, a second friendly chief. "I have always been told that this fellow is a perfect demon in human shape. At the market of Kremis, he once robbed a man of his ass, without his being aware of the theft, although he was sitting on its back at the time."

"Indeed!" said the magistrate, in a fidget. "I should be very glad to know that he was definitely in custody under lock and key."

"He has the strength of twenty men," observed Ben Maoudj, a third philo-Gallic chieftian. He once stole a camel laden with wheat from a caravan proceeding to the south; and, as the animal was unable to travel over the rocky road by which he wanted to pass, he took it on his back, wheat and all, and carried it in that way for half-a-night's march."

"That must be a slight exaggeration," remarked the President, now feeling horribly uncomfortable. "Nevertheless, I should like to be quite sure that he had reached the inside of the prison walls. They are very long about it, they ought to be back by this time."

"Do you wish that I should go and see?" asked Ben Safi, pitying his friend's uneaseness.

"I shall be much obliged to you."

At the moment when Ben Safi was leaving the court, a distant clamour was heard from without, followed by several successive gunshots. A sound of many footsteps was audible as if a crowd of men were approaching. The doors were thrown open violently, and Djilali made his appearance. His clothes were torn and soiled with dirt, and his right eye seemed to have suffered severely.

"Ouf" he puffed out, "my back is broken! May Sidi Abd-Allah burn me, if he is a man."

"Explain yourself. Tell me!" said the court, on thorns. "Ben Serraq?—"

"Ben Serraq, indeed? If ever you contrive to get him into prison, I will consent to be roasted alive.

"He has escaped, then?"

"How should it be otherwiso; he is the devil in person?"

"Have the goodness to tell me how you could have been so stupid as to let a single man break away from ten of you."

"The thing was very simple, and he was not long about it. When we got to the prison, at the same instant when they opened the door, he unceremoniously seized the sentinel's gun; he twisted it round like the sails of a windmill, and threw down three-fourths of our number flat on our backs. I immediately rushed upon him; together with the rest who were still on their legs, and you see"—here he exhibited his exterior, including his black and swollen eye—"what I got by it. After having nearly felled me by putting his ,doubled fist into my eye, he seized me by the skin and threw me, like a bundle of old clothes, on the top of my comrades. We were all left rolling pell-mell together, and when I got up, I saw that demon already landed on the other side of the river. The guard came out and fired more than thirty musket shots at him while he was climbing up the bank; but, bless me! they might just as well have dusted his back with pepper and salt. The bullets were flattened without hurting him."

"The thing is prodigious!"

"After he got to the other side of the river, no one knows what became of him. Some say that he burrowed into the ground, whilst others declare that he took flight with a couple of great black wings that suddenly grew out of his sides and unfolded wide. The soldiers belonging to the guard will have it that he laid hold of a horse that was grazing there, that he jumped on its back, and set off at full gallop."

Here is a newspaper denial by Thomas Carlylo of some statement dorogatory to himself:

"Sir—The thing now 'going the rounds' is untrue, diverges from the fact throughout, and in essentials is curiously the reverse of the fact; and 'incredible' (and at one forgetable) 'thing.' That is the solution of your difficulty.

T. Carlyle."

Was ever a lie so thoroughly drenched with Carlyleism?

In a trial of speed at a race in Benniugton between a famous walker and a fast horse of that place, in which the man was to walk a quarter of a mile in less time than the horse trotted one half a mile, the first heat was won by the horse, but the man took the next two with ease, in 1:23 and 1:25.

If ill-luck befall you, think that it may be a blessing to somebody else, and that your turn may come next.

Folly has more commentators than wisdom—perhaps because her works are more numerous.

Women, we sometimes think, more easily pardon faults in men than excellences in each other.

Every time you avoid doing wrong, you increase your inclination to do that which is right.

THE CROWDED STREET.

LET me move slowly through the street,
Filled with an ever shifting tram,
Amid the sounds of steps that beat
The murmuring walks like Autumn rain.

How fast the flitting figures come!
The mild, the fierce, the stony face—
Some bright with thoughtless smiles, and some
Where secret tears have left their trace.

They pass to toil, to strife, to rest—
To halls in which the feast is spread—
To chambers where the funeral guest
In silence sits beside the dead.

And some to happy homes repair,
Where children, pressing cheek to cheek,
With mute caresses shall declare
The tenderness they cannot speak.

And some who walk in calmness here,
Shall shudder as they reach the door
Where one who made their dwelling dear,
Its flower, its light, is seen no more.

Youth, with pale cheek and slender frame,
And dreams of greatness in thine eye!
Go'st thou to build an early name,
Or early in the task to die?

Keen son of trade, with eager brow!
Who is now fluttering in thy snare?
Thy golden fortunes, tower they now,
Or melt the glittering spires in air?

Who of this crowd to night shall tread
The dance till daylight gleam again?
Who sorrow o'er the untimely dead?
Who writhe in throes of mortal pain?

Some, famine-stricken, shall think how long
The cold dark hours, how slow the night;
And some who flaunt amid the throng
Shall hide in dens of shame to night.

Each where his tasks or pleasures call,
They pass, and heed each other not.
There is who heeds, who holds them all
In His large love and boundless thought.

These struggling tides of life, that seem
In wayward, aimless course to tend,
Are eddies of the mighty stream
That rolls to its appointed end.

POETRY OF THE INDIAN.

KENDALL, of the New Orleans Picayune, who feels that unless the government adopts more active measures against the Indians of Texas, the little hair left on the top of his head is in peril while he remains on his ranch near New Braunfels, thus writes: "Throwing aside as bosh all the sickly sentiment and trifling twaddle which it is fashionable to indulge in about the Indian, he really has a species of poetry about him—I mean the prairie Indian. We will suppose a band of Comanches on a reservation, bound over as the government fondly but foolishly thinks, to keep on their good behavior on the strength of having their animal wants provided for. The deer, antelope, and other game soon is killed off, within the limits of the reservation—that we all know; the young braves and hunters have done this, and all for grandeur and pastime. What next are the young and active men of the tribe to do? I will suppose a highly painted and beaded belle among them of eighteen summers, with three sprightly aspirants anxious to draw her off to their blanket and board, such as they are or it is. She wishes to have a catalogue of their claims spread before her betore she decides. One says: 'During the last moon I have loafed about in the shade, have slept eighteen hours out of the twenty-four, have killed two coons and one mule-eared rabbit, the skins of which I present to you, and won a buffalo skin in a horse race.' This is a schedule duly, delivered, of what he has done, and for which humbly sues for smiles and favor. The next brave comes up and submits his case. He says: 'I, too, have slept—slept a heap. I have regularly drawn government rations of mess pork and hard biscuit, except on several occasions, when I was snoozing and did not know that the commissary had opened. I killed a polecat the other night which was prowling about camp, but lost three arrows in the grass which it took me two weeks to make. The moon was clouded, or I should have killed the animal at the first shot.' Aspirant No. 2 stands aside or rolls himself up in his buffalo robe and goes to sleep, and suitor No. 3 appears for a hearing. 'What have you done during the last moon?' inquires the copper-colored fair one. 'I slipped off and went down to the Texas settlemeuts, killed an old man and two children that I caught out unarmed, stole seven horses, was pursued, but threw all off on a cold trail, got safely back, and here I am. The horses I stole are all staked in front of your father's wigwam, and there are the scalps,' throwing them into the girl's lap. The first words she would utter would of course be, 'Come rest in this bosom,' with the accompaniments, and it is needless to say that the loafing lovers would be left out in the cold. What chance would the workers in mess pork, hard sleep, coon skins and such like stand against three scalp and seven stolen horses?

NO CARDS.

MARRIED, in Saint Cranberry church, on the 16th ult., by the write Rev. Charles Augustus Donnelly, D. D., M. D., assisted by the Pater Familias, Johnny Cake, in the 28th year of his age, to Sal Soda, only sister of Cream of Tartar, age unknown. Peace to their ashes, in memoriam, "no cards." Reverend Jackson Whittlesby, sole agent. For further particulars, see small bills.

This was a regular "no card" affair, a regular "know nothing." Sal was almost my next of kin. I knew her so well, I used to see her every wash-day at mother's, and her sister, Cream of Tartar, used to come bake days. Sal used to wear lots of pink ribbon, and had lots of base balls, made of chalk, which she used to grind down on her neck. Then she'd scratch her cheeks with red flannel until she would look proper nice, and I'd sometimes get spooney like, and wish we might "bile" together through life in the same dish. Then I'd be taken with a spasm of getting along without her, and I concluded to make nary a "pop." She used to stick up her nose and say, "There wasn't a man on earth she'd have." She couldn't come that on me. I was afraid to ask her, so I'd say, "Softly, Sal, softly, he is around somewhere; your affinity lingers in the suburbs, and he'll have you yet." Then she'd call me a "hateful old thing," but I didn't make a cravat of my arm, and put it around her neck, for play eating oranges with her lips, because I was "a well-to-do fellow," and didn't care about having a dividend declared in her favor in "a breach of promise" arrangement. If she had any love for me, it could congeal on her cheek, and shrivel tho ticking instrument in her left side as much as it please, for me. I said, "let 'em congeal and shrink, she'll get over it," and she did. She ran the point of a parasol in a "feller's" eye. She said, "Forgive me," and he did it. They took many pleasant excursions by the sea-side, crossing Fulton Ferry. She came the old game over him—got him, in a moment of derangement, to whimper—

"Have me, sweet one, to travel life's thorny pathway together?"

He'd learnt this from a spelling-book, but she said yes so quick it made his ears ache; so he had her, and she had him, and both had each other. The moonlight walks, Billy-dues, and going to circuses stopt, and the stern realities of life commenced, and in two weeks they were having their breakfast duetts and spats, like all sensible married folks. Old "no cards" was at the wedding. That old cuss goes to too many weddings. It is a cheap way of doing it to invite that "old bummer." Marriage and economy don't mix, and a wedding is a poor place to start in on the cheap John line. Brides don't think of Economy at the altar; they only think of keeping your clod-hoppers of their lace vails, of the orange blossoms on their "top-knots," and looking graceful. Half the gals in the world get married to get a new white silk dress and ten yards of vail, and make a splurge as the "company front" up the middle aisle of a church, to the tune of "Hark! the conquering shero comes," from an organ blowed by water-power.

Gals, in their girlhood are queer things. They think much of their "tout ensemble." A married one is a "big thing" to have in the house, though they have such a sweet way of saying; "Huppy I require twenty dollars, that's a good dear," that any hemale, unless he has an anvil where his heart ought to be, will down with the "spondulix." I pity any man of twenty-eight that has't a pair of neat little duxynuxy gaiters, leaning up against his boots nights. He that has't is an unsociable old cuss; but I am down on "no cards" Out of one hundred cases of "no cards" tested by proper authorities, only 7 8-7 have prospered, while the old style gets along bully. Getting married is like starting business; it is a partnership affair, only there is never a silent partner. Gals, don't never give a "no card" wedding. If you can't afford cake and wine, give gingerbread and cider. Have something, it it is only a quart of milk and a biled cracker. They say cold water is better than nothing; but I prefer nothing; it set better, and is easer digested. "Liker" only makes the head swim, while water will swim the whole body. Water is only good to grow fish in, and make fountains and shower-baths of. Just think of water on the brain, and don't get up a wedding on it. And, hubs, when you get your gal all to yourself—when you have a prior claim, like Claude Melnotte, &c,—sink or swim, live or die, survive or perish, never, no, never, wish you had the ten dollar gold piece you paid the minister back again. Hold your head high, roll up your shirt-sleeves, and work hard for the "spondulix," for you will need it for little shoes, first and secoud readers, geographies, arithmetics, and sich like, and remember that if the paper did say "no cards," it did't say no baby.

Love is the shadow of the morning, which decreases as the day advances. Friendship is the shadow of the evening, which strengthens with the setting sun of life.

The great source of pleasure is variety. We love to expect; and when expectation is disappointed or gratified, we want to be again expecting.

LITERARY GLEANINGS.

A MEAN POET.

WE have always been inclined to the opinion that the author of the "Pleasures of Memory" owed his fame, more to his wealth and social position, than to the intrinsic merits of his literary productions. The best of his poems, if published at the present day, for the first time, would attract little attention, and most assuredly would not make a reputation. A paper that recently appeared in the London Art Journal, written by Mr. S. C. Hall, who, at one time, contemplated writing Rogers' biography, and seems to have made himself familiar with his subject, while it confirms our opinion that the poet was not a man of genius, directly contradicts the general impression that he was liberal in his style of living, in his patronage of art and literature, and in the general use of his wealth. As there is no biography of Rogers, that we are aware of, except such slight sketches as are prefixed to the various editions of his works, and as there is much in Mr. Hall's article that is new and interesting—to us, at least—we give a few excerpts:

HIS PERSONAL APPEARANCE.

"His countenance was the theme of continual jokes. It was 'ugly,' if not repulsive. The expression was in no way, nor under any circumstances, good; he had a drooping eye and a thick under lip; his forehead was broad, his head large—out of propotion, indeed, to his form; but it was without the organs of benevolence and veneration, although preponderating in that of ideality. His features were cadaverous. Lord Dudley once asked him why, now that he could afford it, he did not set up his hearse; and it is said that Sydney Smith gave him mortal offence by recommending him, 'when he sat for his portrait, to be drawn saying his prayers, with his face hidden by his hands.' Moore thus alludes to Rogers as a critic:—'He only finds fault with every part in detail; and this, you know, is the style of his character.' And Lady Donegal, in reply, speaks of his 'sickly and discontented turn of mind, which makes him dissatisfied with everything, and disappointed in all his views of life;' speaking, also, of his 'unfortunate habit of dwelling upon the faults and follies of his friends."

HIS PARSIMONY.

"Rogers was rich, had few claimants on his 'much,' and his personal wants were limited; he seems, indeed, to have had no great relish for the luxuries that money supplies, and which it is a duty to obtain on the part of those to whom wealth is allotted. He saw little company at his own house; giving breakfasts frequently, the cost of which was small, and seldom entertaining at dinner above two or three at a time. Moreover, they were dinners of no very recherché character; at all events, none of his guests ever spoke of them as feasts of a Sybarite. He never, I believe, kept a carriage—certainly, if he did, he seldom used it. On occasions, when he attended meetings of the Royal Society, and other assemblages of that kind, at the close, let the night be ever so severe, if rain or snow were falling, he was invariably seen buttoning up his great-coat in preparation for a walk home. On one occasion I ventured to say to him (it was an evening at Lord Northampton's, in Connaught Place:) 'Mr. Rogers, it is a very wet night, have a fly at the door, may I have the honor to leave you at your house?' but the invitation was declined; the old man faced the weather from which younger and stronger men would have wisely shrunk.

When Turner illustrated his poems, the artist was to have fifty pounds apiece for the drawings. But Rogers objected to the price, which he had 'miscalculated,' and Turner agreed to take them all back, receiving five pounds each for the use of them. The banker did not foresee a time when the purchase would have been a very good speculation indeed; if he had, there is little doubt he would have paid for them. He made other bargains that were remunerative: the famous 'Puck,' of Sir Joshua Reynolds, he purchased for two hundred and fifteen pounds five shillings."

"No doubt, he was often worried by application for aid; some from fraudulent petitioners, but some from persons to whom timely helps might have been great blessings—probably saved the lives, possibly the souls, of those who asked it.

He writes;—'The letters I received from people of both sexes, (people I have never heard of,) asking me for money, either as a gift or a loan, are really innumerable;' but it is evident from the context that such 'begging epistles' produced no results to the writers. It is recorded that Murphy owed him two hundred pounds; the poet became 'uneasy,' and accompanied Murphy to his chambers to be paid. Once there, however, Murphy, instead of paying the existing debt, laboured hard to borrow more—an attempt which the poet successfully resisted. Rogers afterward took as security an assignment of the whole of Murphy's works, (including his 'Tacitus,) but found they had been previously disposed of to a bookseller. And in the 'Table Talk' there is a note that Shelley called upon Rogers—introducing himself—to request the loan of some money which he wished to present to Leigh Hunt, offering Rogers a bond for it. Rogers says, 'having numerous claims upon me at that time, I was obliged to refuse the loan.'"

MADAME DE STAEL AND CAMPBELL.

"Rogers, himself states that Madame de Staël once said to him: 'How very sorry I am for Campbell! His poverty so unsettles his mind that he cannot write.' This was the answer of Rogers:—'I replied. 'why does he not take the situation of a clerk? He could then compose verses during his leisure hours;'' and he adds, 'I shall never forget the delight with which, on returning home (from his bank to his mansion,) I used to read and write during the evening;' moralizing thus: 'When literature is the sole business of life, it becomes a drudgery: when we are able to resort to it only at certain times, it is a charming relaxation."

"When Rogers uttered these words in protest against the generous sympathy of Madame de Staël, there were men starving in London streets, whose minds were pregnant with even greater creations than the 'Pleasures of Memory,' or 'Human Life,' and who gave them to the world before they left it. Crabbe may, by that time, have found means to buy and pay for food and clothes; Campell may have been on the eve of rescue from poverty by the pension he earned and gained; Southey may have had his home fireside cheered by a remittance from Murray; and Leigh Hunt may have stayed the cravings of angry creditors by aid of some sympathizing friend; but there were scores of great men obscurely hidden in mighty London, whose struggles with penury would appall those whom 'plenure, ease, and affluence surround'—enduring 'all the sad varieties of woe,' some of whom may have made their wants known, while others triumphantly averted the bitter end; though others were voluntary victims before their work was half done."

HIS GUESTS.

"His house had been full of art-luxuries, gathered by judicious expenditure of wealth, and by highly cultivated taste; they were scattered by the hammer of the auctioneer after his death, and are the gems of a hundred collections. Yet the house will be always one of the memorable dwellings of London. 'It was.' I borrow the eloquent words of Mr. Hayward, 'here that Erskine told the story of his first brief, and Grattan that of his last duel; that Wellington described Waterloo as a 'battle of giants;' that Chantrey, placing his hand on a mahogany pedestal, asked the host he then honored by his presence:—'Do you remember a workman who, at five shillings a day, came in at that door to receive your orders? I was that workman!' There had assembled Byron, Moore' Scott, Campbell, Wordsworth, Washington Irving, Coleridge, Sydney Smith, Sheridan, and a host of other immortal men, who gave renown to the nineteenth century, and 'live for aye in Fame's eternal volume.'"

POPULAR ENGLISH COMIC SONGS.

According to the London Orchestra, the kind of songs now most acceptable to that portion of the London public that affect "minstrelsy" and frequent Music Halls, are not at all above our own melodeon standard. In fact, they are, judging from the specimens given by the Orchestra, far below it. "Jessie, the Belle at the Rail Bar," which is said to be amazingly popular at the Hall, opens thus:

"'Twas at the Moorgate Station, in pursuit of my vocation,
I saw a tall and handsome girl behind the Railway Bar:
I heard some one call her Jessie—perhaps 'twas Spiers and Pond the lessee—
And her diamond eyes were twinkling just like an evening star.
I found this pretty dame made love to all that came,
In a quiet sort of way with her eyes so soft and bright;
She had lovers half a score, always some one to adore,
From the first train in the morning till the last train out at night.
A tinker and a tailor, and a soldier and a sailor,
And a swell who used to talk about his pa and his ma,
A butcher and a baker, and a quiet-looking Quaker,
All courted pretty Jessie at the Railway Bar."

Another one of these effusions entitled "Johnny the Engine Driver," which enjoys a large share of public favor, seems to be designed for a female singer, whose forte it is to make bold appeals to secure the admiration of her audiences. The song glorifies the engine driver, and indeed everything connected with engines, in the spirit of the frankest hero-worship:

Oh! my Johnny is the driver of a big Engine,
On the railway line, oh he looks so fine,
And on pancake day he's to be mine,
Is Johnny the Engine driver.

This story is not a narrative, but dilates on the praises of Johnny. The capital letters in the concluding verse are quoted literally, and evidently indicate the author's idea of the points to be made:

One day he quickly asked if I'd
His "STOKER" be for life,
Or, rather to be plainer, would
I be his darling wife?
So I promised to be his "TENDER" half,
And he vowed by "SMOKE" and "STEAM,"
We ne'er should RAIL, but keep in line,
And make LIFE pass LIKE A DREAM!

The following is an extract from a song known as "He's a Pal o' Mine," which the Orchestra says is "at present in the mouth of every street boy." It represents the manners and social customs of the aristocracy from the Music Hall point of view. Here is the conception of the "stylo" of the Belgravian ladies that seems to be general with the classes with whom this kind of musical literature is popular:

When the feed's over then we go
Bent on the dance somewhere in Belgravia,
On the light fantastic toe,
With this pal o' mine!
The ladies simper, "Naughty man,
Why do you come so late?"
And tap us gently with their fan,
And say we are their fate!

In a song, recommended on the tittle page as "suitable for ladies," occurs the following gem:

I never was cut out to be
An old maid full of grief,
With only parrots, cats, and dogs
To give my mind relief.
Don't think me fast or forward, but,
I'm not ashamed to tell,
To take me out and roam about
I like a lover well!

CHORUS.

I like a lover well—
A rich and charming swell;
Young, dark, or fair, I little care,
So that he treats me well.

Evidently, unless the Orchestra has purposely selected the very lowest and most wretched specimens of these "favorite song," the London music hall audience, is a very great way below the standard of that of the corresponding class of population in New York or San Francisco.

AMBITION OF PARENTS FOR THEIR CHILDREN.

The New York Albion, in a thoughtful disquisition upon "The Degeneracy of Young Men," says:

"The ambition of parents in the lower walks of life to place their sons in a more elevated position is certainly most laudable. Indeed, it has been always the boast of America that her institutions favored the advancement of all classes to the most eligible positions. It is doubtless true, however, that many mistake their vocation, and make their lives failures simply because they attempted to be that which their mental calibre positively forbade. Numbers who would have excelled in a mechanical trade, fail utterly in attempting to be clergymen, lawyers or doctors. But this is no reason why an uneducated laboring man should not, if he can afford it, give his children the education of which he was himself deprived in early life. The error lies to some extent in the parent failing to discover the bent of his child's mind, and place him in the position which he can fill most creditably and with most advantage to himself. One child may have a natural taste for mechanics, and another for letters. Each is equally useful to the community. But if the former is compelled to pore over Latin and Greek, and the latter is apprenticed to a wheel-wright's or a machine shop, there will probably be another wretched mechanic, and another weak professional man, added to the poor ones that already exist."

RAIL-TRACK LAYING MACHINE.—This machine, which has been in course of construction for some time in an enclosed lot on Market street, below Beale, is nearly completed. The machinery is now in working order, and was tried with complete success several days since. Sometime during the coming week a public trial will be made of this track-laying machine on the lower end of Market street; after which it will be shipped to Cisco to commence the contract for laying the track of the Central Pacific Railroad, from thence over the Sierra Nevada. The machine has been constructed under the supervision of its inventor, Mr. Wm. D. Robertson. The boiler, engine and machinery were furnished by Mr. I. H. Small, one of our best resident machinists. Of its success there can be no doubt. It is bound to supplant the manual labor of track-laying in the same manner that the steam-paddy has that of the excavator.

THE FALL.—The Fall of Man led to the institution of new fashions and dress, in which Eve was especially interested. The Fall season of each year brings new fashions. All ladies are especially interested in the fact that Meagher Taaffe & Co., have just received large invoices of Fall goods consisting of rich Silks, Poplins, Ottoman and Empress cloths and other beautiful fabrics. Meagher Taaffe & Co., have long enjoyed the reputation of leading the fashionable dry goods trade of this city, and the announcement that the new fashions have arrived always brings crowds of ladies to No. 9 Montgomery street.

REGENERATOR.—Bonnet has been in Merchant street, laying his asphaltum sidewalks in that busy thoroughfare, from Montgomery to Sansome street, during the present week. Bonnet is apt to create a little smoke and confusion, while he is at work, yet, the benefits of smooth hard sidewalks derived therefrom, in place of the rickety old wooden ones, that were suffered to exist previous, are incalculable. Politically, we are in favor of asphaltum sidewalks, and reduction of taxes. Make Bonnet street commissioner, and pass an universal asphaltum side-walk law, and we shall be perfectly happy.

IN BUSINESS.—The popular newsboy, he of the sonorous voice and courteous demeanor, we mean, who has for years past proclaimed the merits of THE CALIFORNIAN, every Saturday, in his perorations, has established himself in the News and Stationery business on Washington street, one door below Stockton street. We bespeak for him a good run of custom from the residents of that vicinity, and the good wishes for his success from all who know his history.

"THE CHRYSTAL."—Thomas H. McCann & Co. will open to-day at 10 o'clock on the N. W. Corner of Montgomery and Merchant streets with a fine stock of Wines and Liquors. An invitation to call is extended to the public, as well as to old friends and patrons. Hot Lunch will be served daily at 10 o'clock.

DRAMATIC AFFAIRS.

ON Monday, the military drama, by T. W. Robertson and Artemus Ward, entitled Ours was produced at Maguire's Opera Honse to a crowded house. This drama has had quite a successful run wherever it has been produced, and San Francisco has proved no exception. Ours depends, to a great extent for its success, on its sprightly dialogue. The plot is slight. Hugh Chalcote (Edwin Adams) is a rich young man without an object in life; Mary Netle (Mrs. Sophie Edwin) is companion to Lady Shendryn (Mrs. Judah); Mary Netley endeavors, by constant irritation, to rouse the energy of Hugh Chalcote, and, on the breaking out of the Crimean war, fired by her enthusiasm, he buys a commission in "Ours" (i e "our regiment") and proceeds to the seat of war. The Colonel of "Ours" is Sir Alexander Shendryn (H. Edwards). Angus McAllister, (John McCullough) of "Ours," is in love with Blanche Haye, (Miss Sallie Hinckley) the rich ward of Sir Alexander Shendryn. Prince Peroosky, (H. Sinclair) a Russian nobleman, is also in love with Blanche. In the first act, the dramatis personæ wander about the park at Shendryn grange, and much lively dialogue takes place as they pair off together. The wife of Sergeant Jones, of "Ours," has just had twins, and the inmates of Shendryn Grange evince much interest in the event. I am sorry to say that some of the critics of the daily press considered the allusion made to the twins "coarse," indelicate," "almost indecent." Hugh Chalcote expresses his opinion that such women as Mrs. Jones "should not be encouraged]" but he does not go to the length of considering the twins an improper subject of conversation. It does not speak well for the morals of a community when little jokes about babies are considered too broad for the stage. I heard nothing said about the twins which could shock my modesty; I could stand any joke about twins except the practical joke of my better half doing as Mrs. Jones, of "Ours," did. Lady Shendryn is jealous of Sir Alexander Shendryn in consequence of having discovered he had, since his marriage, made a faux pas. He has repented, but is still constantly taunted and suspected. The quarrels of the elderly couple form a capital foil to the love scenes between Angus and Blanche, while the sharp skirmishes between Hugh and Mary add to the animation of the play. The second act closes with a capital scene representing the departure of "Ours" for the Crimea, where the troops, headed by a brass band, are seen, through the windows of Sir Alexander's drawing-room, marching through St. James' Park. (The scenery from the Long Strike representing the factories of Manchester didn't look much like St. James' Park; with this exception everything was perfect). In the last act all the dramatis personæ are brought together in a hut at Sebastopol, and the play ends with the announcement that peace has been proclaimed. Hugh Chalcote, whose experience in the Crimea has much improved him, proposes to Mary Netley and is accepted. Angus McAllister is, by the generosity of Prince Peroosky, enabled to marry Blanche Haye. Sir Alexander's character is cleared, Lady Shendryn asks forgiveness, Hugh promises to educate Sergeant Jones' boy twin and buy him a commission, and everyone is happy. The chief fault of this play consists in its lack of action; that it is well written and cleverly constructed was proved conclusively by the fact the audience on every night of its representation were most liberal of their applause, and laughed heartily. There is very little "sensation" in it, and common-place incidents are made to cause laughter; this proves the skill of the author, and the talent of the actors. Mr. Adams' "Hugh Chalcote" was a finished impersonation; he was especially good in the scene in the Crimean hut, and caused much laughter by the manner in which he conducted his cooking operations. Mrs, Sophie Edwin was very vivacious as "Mary Netley," and caused much laughter in the drill scene in the last act. H. Edwards' "Sir Alexander Shendryn" was a capital piece of acting; he represented the character to the life, and displayed an earnestness in his discussions with his jealous better half which delighted everyoue. Miss Sallie Hinckley is devoting herself so assiduously to the study of her profession, and evinces so much talent in characters suited to her, that she deserves more than the mild praise which some critics are fond of giving her. Her acting in the character of "Blanche Haye" was very good; it was natural and never over-strained. John McCullough played "Angus McAllister" in his usual even manner, and was particularly happy in the love-making scenes. W. Barry's "Sergeant Jones" was perfect; he made every point in a quiet, artistic manner which never failed to bring down the house. Mrs. Judah was excellent in the character of "Lady Shendryn." The piece was, in fact, very well cast throughout. It has drawn good houses every night this week, it will be performed this afternoon and also in the evening. On Monday, Wild Oats will be played in order to gratify a very generally expressed wish on the part of the part of the part of the public. The engagement of Mr. Adams is drawing to a close; it bids fair to prove the most successful played by any actor in this city.

On Friday next, John McCullough, who has, in many plays, almost equally shared the laurels with Edwin Adams, will be the recipient of a complimentary benefit tendered him by that liberal-minded actor. Damon and Pythias will be played, and the entertainment will terminate with the comedy of The Honeymoon. Mr. McCullough has deserved well at the hands of the public, and is sure to have a bumper benefit.

At the Metropolitan Theatre, the sensation drama of The Incendiaries was produced, on Wednesday, and gave general satisfaction. On Tuesday, Julien and Phillippe Martinetti had a good benefit, and played a good bill, consisting of the drama of The Old Guard, gymnastic performances, a ballad by Henri Herberte, the pantomime of The Magician's Gift, a chorus by the Lafayette Philharmonic Society, and a tablean representing "The Death of Abel," by the Martinettis. On Wednesday, the fairy play entitled Kate Kearney; or, The Fairy of the Lakes of Killarney was presented. In this, Miss Emma Howson and Henri Herberte sang beautifully; Miss Clelia Howson acted in her usual arch and charming manner, H. D. Thompson was quite at home in the character of a villainous Landlord, and the piece throughout was capitally acted. The entertainment concluded with the clever burlesque entitled Ill-Treated Il Trovatore in which all engaged in the representation appeared to advantage. Miss Emma Howson sang sweetly, and acted very cleverly in the role of "Manrico," and gained much applause. Frank Howson's "Count de Luna" was a very amusing piece of acting, and Miss Clelia Howson as "Leonora" was, as usual, excellent. John Howson's "Azucena" is an admirable burlesque impersonation, and he uses his falsetto with much effect. Altogether this piece, as played by the Metropolitan company, is one of the most amusing burlesques ever produced in this city. It will be played this afternoon in conjunction with The Old Guard. Last night, a new local play entitled Life in California, was produced for the benefit of the Scandinavian Society's Relief Fund. The company did their best to make something out of it, but it was wretched trash, without plot or situations; the dialogue was tedious, and there was far too much of it. However, it did well enough for a benefit night. To-night, Mrs. Harry Jackson will appear in one of her best impersonations—"Lady Audley" in Lady Audley's Secret. By the way, this accomplished actress, concerning whose merit there can be but one opinion, will be the recipient of a benefit on Tuesday evening; Janet Pride will be performed; it is to be hoped the house will be crowded in every part.

The British vessel Douglas, which arrived at this port on Thursday, 81 days from Sydney, brought Mr. Alexander Fitzgerald, who comes under the engagement to Manager Howson, of the Metropolitan Theatre. Mr. Fitzgerald was formerly leading man at several of the New York and Boston theatres, and is now returning home after a most successful tour through the Australasian Colonies. He is said to be an accomplished Irish comedian, somewhat after the style of the lamented G. V. Brooke. He will commence his engagement shortly.

On Tuesday, one of our most accomplished Californian musicians died. Christian Stadfeldt, who came to this country at the age of sixteen years, had attained great proficiency in his profession as a pianist, when he was called away. He was only 29 years, 11 months, and 6 days old, at the time of his death. His unitmely decease is much regretted by all who knew him; he was a genial, whole-souled fellow, had few enemies, and a host of friends. The body was committed to the grave with full musical honors on Wednesday afternoon.

The Martinetti Troupe leave this morning on the Constitution, en route for Australia. Andrew Birrell, who has for the past six years filled the position of treasnrer at the Metropolitan Theatre in which he holds interest, has entered into partnership with the Martinettis, and will act as their manager and agent in Australia. Mr. Birrell has resided for seventeen years in this State, and leaves behind him many friends who will regret his departure. His absence from California will, however, be only temporary, and its duration will depend upon the amount of success with which he and the troupe meet in Australia. G. Mitchell takes Mr. Birrell's place in the box-office,

TOUCHSTONE.

ITALIAN OPERA.—The Academy of Music was thronged last night, when the celebrated opera of L'Africaine was produced. The early hour at which we go to press, precludes the possibility of giving a criticism in this issue. It will be repeated this evening; on Monday and Tuesday evenings of next week, and on Wendesday for the benefiit of Madame Stella Bonheur.

THE B'NAI B'RITH THEATRICAL PERFORMANCE.—The performance of the Marble Heart, at the Academy of Music, on Wendesday was a decided success. The entertainment was given by the B'nai B'rith Social Circle, for the benefit of the First Hebrew Benevolent Society. A large audience was present. Mr. Sam. Lezynski acted "Phidias" in the prologue, and afterwards "Raphael" in a very creditable manner. Mr. Lezynski with more experience, would become a very good actor; he has most of the required natural qualifications. Miss Anna Goldstein's "Marco" was a graceful and self-possessed rendition, though not a very artistic one; Miss Augusta Livingston quite gained the hearts of the audience by the manner in which she played "Marie." Mr. Weiner's conception of the character of "Volago" was correct and he carried it out skillfully. Altogther, the performance was a very good one; all present were pleased and an admirable charity was benefitted.

WOODWARD'S GARDENS.—These beautiful gardens never presented a more attractive appearance than at the present time. Thousands of rare plants are in full bloom, the grape houses are filled with vines loaded with grapes of every variety, while in the hot-houses pine apples, oranges, lemons and limes are ripening. An attractive feature has been added to the Zoological collection in the shape of a "happy family"—a cage containing bears, rabbits, cats, dogs, monkeys and birds of various kinds. A beautiful fawn has lately been born, and a pair of Mexican antelopes and a three legged sheep are among the new attractions.

ANATOMICAL MUSEUM.—Numerous additions have been made to this fine collection of models, Dr. Jordan having returned from Europe. Lectures on subjects interesting to every one are delivered at eight o'clock in the evening. Persons visiting the city should not leave without having inspected these beautiful and instructive works of art.

PRACTICAL PATRIOTISM.

WE publish below a letter of Mr. Thos. Mooney to Messrs. Rector & Co., of the Oakland Woolen and Cotton Factory; a letter which might pass unregarded, were simple, good sense and reason over common among men. Mr. Mooney acknowledges receipt of a piece of goods from the factory of Rector & Co., and commends its good qualities, as any other man might do. So far the matter is one of mere giving and taking; but when Mr. Mooney goes on to recommend the establishment of factories and the investment of money at home, he speaks golden words; and gold is rare, even in California. What can be sounded or truer than this? 'There is no 'royal road' to national prosperity; it can be reached only by toiling intelligently, by discouraging idlers, and by honoring industry.' If it is in this spirit that the Builders' Insurance Company is managed, who can deny that such an institution is of great usefulness to the State? Mr. Mooney has advanced to Messrs. Rector and Co., the sum of twenty thousand dollars, and in so doing has shown that large liberality in aid of every home enterprise, which has always characterized the capitalists of California.

To Messers. Rector & Co., Proprietors Oakland Woolen and Cotton Factory—Gentlemen: I have to thank you for a piece of your excellent Oakland Tweed, made by you from California Wool, mixed with California grown Cotton, in the manufacture of which, white labor only is employed. I have got it made into an overcoat and like it well; it is light and warm and will wear—no baneful shoddy in this coat—its cheapness must beget for it an entensive demand. The coat I previously wore was of foreign material, and cost me some forty dollars. The coat made from your material stands me only in fifteen dollars; and I am convinced snch coats can be made up for ten dollars. It is excellent material for boys' clothing and ladies' street jackets, this Oakland Tweed. Here are inducements enough for our California people to use extensively your (their own) manufacture. We shall require twenty factories to supply it. Every coat, or pants, or vest of this material used by our people, gives employment to some one amongst themselves, and augments the common stock of wealth of the whole community. Sending our earnings to foreign workmen for that which we can oursleves produce is a sign of either ignorance or insanity. It is by helping to establish manufactures in this country that we can best develop its resources; find home customers for the farmers' produce; find constant employment for the laborer; find a fair and certain return for cash capital. There is no "Royal Road" to national prosperity: it can be reached only by toiling intelligently; by discouraging idlers; by honoring industry, and by loving the product of our own hands.

In this spirit I offer you my support. I shall lend you money and wear your manufactures, as long as you use native grown material and employ white labor: when you change, I shall change.

On those conditions, I request you to send me material for for twenty suits of clothes for the use of the employées in the California Building and Savings Bank, and in the Builders' Insurance Company, over both of which I have the honor to preside as President. Repsectfully, gentlemen,

Your sinsere friend.

THOMAS MOONEY.

TAYLOR'S SALOON.—This quiet retreat on Third street, a few doors from Market, has long been the most popnlar resort for gentlemen of taste in liquid lnxuries of any saloon south of Montgomery street. Taylor has achieved more than mere local fame for the purity of his beverages and the superiority of his brands of ale.

WILD LIFE IN THE SOUTH PACIFIC.

ARDENT and eager minded men are always ready to start on the most perilous enterprise at the risk of life and of everything else that is dear to them. Whether the object be the discovery of a passage at the North Pole, or of the source of the Nile, or of the mysteries of Mecca, of the unknown tracks in the interior of Africa, or of the remains of Nineveh —a Franklin, a Baker, a Burton, a Livingstone, a Layard, are at hand to start, backed by some geographical or other society, and the result to science, history, and geography, has been great. Other men, either by accident or from personal enterprise, have done good service in the same cause without any claim to national reward. The adventures of a Robinson Crusoe are of universal interest, and it is in this latter category that we must place the recital by E. H. Lamont of his personal adventures in the South Pacific Islands, or Polynesia. The story is a romance of real life, graphically told. Shipwrecked and a prisoner, Lamont gradually becomes a friend and chieftain of the natives.

But we will let Lamont tell his own tale. Settled in California for trading purposes, and business being slack in the winter months, he arranged with his partner to make a trading voyage through some of the islands of the South Pacific, which he estimated would occupy not more than four months, permitting their return in time for spring trade. They were joined by a California gentleman who professed an intimate knowledge of the islands, and they chartered a fast sailing clipper-brig, called the Chatham, of some three hundred tons burden, for the expedition. George Snow, an old whaler, a native of Nantucket, was installed as captain. The captain turned out a drunkard, and the crew were not to be relied upon. This was found out too late; the final result was the loss of the vessel. The Chatham started on her trip on the 14th of October, 1852. After a passing visit to the French settlement at the Marquesas, the Chatham arrived without any incident worth relating off the Bay of Hana-ti-Tapa.

"This bay," says our author, "is small, and sheltered on all sides, except the west, from which point the wind rarely blows. There is good anchorage in it, but room only for three or four vessels to swing at a time. We had not yet dropped our anchor, when we observed the beach crowded with natives, and, from the display of white tapa, the fair sex evidently formed a large portion of the multitude. Several canoes were already pulling out toward us. In one of the first of these was a figure arrayed in bright scarlet, who the interpreter informed us was the king, and in a moment he and his native courtiers were on board."

Kings and queens abound in these islands, and the following description may serve for nearly all of them:

"His majesty's robes consisted of a small scarlet blanket fastened with a wooden skewer across his neck, and a tapa girt around his loins. The queen, who also came on board, was clothed in the usual sheet of white tapa, which, leaving the right arm bare, is cast over the left shoulder, and completely envelopes the form to the ankles. Her hair, raised entirely up round her head, was folded on one side into a kind of pinnacle, which was swathed in a roll of very fine tapa like muslin. Her ears were perforated, and ornamented with curiously cut bones or ivory, and around her neck were some strings of scented nuts and wreaths of flowers. The arm was tattoed elaborately, from the finger-ends to near the shoulder, with a deep-blue tinge, which was not unbecoming. Her feet and ankles seemed to be covered with beautifully worked blue stockings, and as I stooped to admire them, her majesty, flattered by the attention, rather shocked my modsety by suddenly, amid the uproarious mirth of her court, lifting the drapery to such a height that I observed the same delicate tracery, which was evidently due to the art of the tattoer, extending above the knee.

Throughout the whole of the group of islands the females are described as of beautiful form and of gentle manners. The Chatham paid a visit in turn to the different islands, trafficking with the natives, taking in sandal wood and live stock in exchange for old guns, flints, powder, and blankets.

Tahiti is the next point visited, now inseparably connected with the names of Pritchard and Queen Pomare. The natives have nearly all embraced Christianity. The morality of the Tahitian nymphs, however, is anything but exemplary, and the inhabitants are proverbially idle; many miles of the richest land are allowed to run waste. The island has been so often described that it is needless to dwell upon its natural beauties.

During the short stay of a few days at Tahiti, the Chatham did a good business in disposing of the stock procured at the Marquesas; she was repainted, and laid in merchandise suited for "the Harvey group." She first touched at Huahine to take in cocoa-nuts as food for live stock. The Chatham was delayed here for some time owing to the drunken habits of the captain, and everything on board appears to have been in a state of utter confusion and disgraceful disorder. At last she puts off to sea again, making for the Harvey group.

"We now proceeded again to sea," says Lamont, 'steering our course to Manke, or Parrey's Island, one of the Harvey group. These islands, ten in number, are situated between nineteen degrees ten seconds to twenty two degrees twenty seconds south latitude, and one hundred and fifty-five degrees to one hundred and sixty-one degrees west longitude. The great navigator, Cook, whose name they sometimes bear, had the honor of first discovering them as early as 1777. Rorotonga, containing a population of some five or six thousand, and measuring about thirty miles round, is the principal island of the group, not only in extent and population, but in fertility of soil and beauty of scenery. It has one or two harbors for small craft, which the others are deficient in. Cook never saw this island. The Reverend Mr. Williams, the indefatigible Polynesian missionery, is said to have first discovered the lovely spot. Some teachers from the Society Islands were placed on it by him, and in about two years the whole population was converted to Christianity. Mangaia, or Mangier, is some twenty-five miles in circumference, and it has about two thousand inhabitants. The population of Aiutake is about the same number, and that of Atien, which has a circuit of about twenty miles, one thousand five hundred. Manke, or Parry's Island, which is not mentioned by Cook, is said to have been discovered by the missionaries in 1823. It is not more than sixteen miles round, with a decreasing population of two or three hundred. Mitiaro, near it, is still smaller. Palmerston's, considerably to the westward (by some hydrographers included in the group,) is a low cocoa nut island, and uninhabited. This, with two other small uninhabited islands, concludes the number."

Kings abound in Polynesia like cockroaches. Manke and Mitiaro are subject to the three kings of Atien. Lamont's description of these islands, and of the habits of the natives, is not the least interesting portion of his book. It is a pity that he has not added a map of the islands, which would greatly enhance the value of the work; and we also find fault with him for not giving dates of sailing, though we make out that he sailed on the 14th of October, 1852, on his expedition, and was wrecked on the 7th of January, 1853.

Tomano-wood was the chief object of his visit to the Harvey Islands. It resembles mahogany, is most beautifully waved, and is capable of a high polish, but very hard and rather difficult to work. It is found in large quantities at Menke.

Aitutaké was the place which it was intended to visit last, and with a pleasant breeze the head of the Chatham was turned once more toward California. On the night of the 6th of January, or rather on the morning of the 7th, 1853, the vessel became a total wreck; and we now come to the wonderful adventures of Lamont and his party among the Pacific islanders.

"I had retired to rest early," says Lamont. "I was a light sleeper, especially in the neighborhood of land, having no confidence in either the master or officers; and as we were passing some islands laid down upon our chart, (although, according to the captain's observations, we should have been far out of sight of any of them,) I felt uneasy. At four o'clock A. M. the changing of the watch awoke me, and as it was Mr. Snow's watch on deck, I did not feel again inclined to sleep. As the mate was turning in, he told the captain that he saw something like a dark cloud ahead, and warned him to look out for a squall. It appears, from the statement of one of the boys in this watch, that shortly after he went on deck he saw Captain Snow come out of his cabin, whisper for a short time with his brother, and then retire. This he might have done the back door of the cabin without my observing it On this occasion the oldest and safest hand of the watch was never brought on deck; and the lookout forward consisted of two inefficient hands, one a Kanaka and the other a mere lad. The man at the wheel could not see ahead, on account of the house on deck, immediately in front of him. About twenty minutes afterwards, as I looked through the cabin door out on deck, a shock like that produced by a collision passed through the vessel, and I thought I beheld land close to us. The ship's head, however, rose on the wave toward the sky, and I waited for an instant till she dipped again, when I beheld a long line of black low coast stretching far on either side, girt with a circle of foaming breakers, the roar of which was already in my ears. A westerly wind blew dead ashore; we were running right before it, and were not a gun-shot from the reef. I sprang at once on deck, followed almost immediately by all the crew. 'Hard up!' some one shouted, and up went the wheel, the yards were trimmed to the wind, and the good vessel, obedient to her command, worked round, giving us yet a chance, when another voice called out 'Hard down,' and the mate at the helm obeyed too faithfully the order, depriving us of the last hope of saving the ship. The next moment her bottom struck a sunken rock, making the vessel real, and almost throwing us off our feet. A white-crested wave, rising us on its top, bore us onward with impetuous force, and dashed us amid the boiling foam on the rugged walls of coral. Fortunately, we went head on, and our bow struck into a little bight of the rock, where it was firmly bedded, About midships we rested on a rock below, on which each wave that dashed on our stern and broke over us raised the vessel, and let her drop with such force that we feared she would part in two. The spars swung and shivered with the concussion, threatening to fall about our ears, and the sails, which no one ventured aloft to furl, began to lash the yards and fly in shreds, whilst the parting stays menaced us with tottering masts. Our only trust was that the vessel would hold together until daylight. The supposed cloud seen by the mate proved to be the Penryhn, Islands laid down on every chart, and mentioned particularly by Wilks."

The native board the vessel; the crew get safely to shore, but are not ill treated. Gradually they become friends with these primitive people. Lamont is soon a general favorite, and, seeing no chance of escape, gives it up after several attempts, and makes himself at home as best he can, becoming the adopted son of one of the chieftains. The name of that portion of the island upon which the Chatham was wrecked is called Mangerongaro, The island is from four to five miles long, and about a quarter of a mile broad. The description of the habits and customs of these islanders cannot fail to be read with interest; but we have only space for a few extracts Gradually Lamont, who had been adopted by a chief, with his numerous savage relations, visits all the islands, helps his friends in their warfare, and keeps his dignity by occasionally them treating contempt. Here is not a bad description of a young savage's home:

"I had scarcely left my hut," he says, "when Turua (a young chief) came running forward, and pressed me, with his winning smile, to accompay him. This I did with pleasure, and he led the way by a path I had not before seen, through the centre of the island. The densest portion of the grove he pointed to with evident marks of satisfaction, as the trees were all loaded with fruit; and the district through which I was passing I was informed was mine, because I knew it was his.' Lamont had already succeeded in understanding the natives, and making himself understood. What high standard of civilzation can beat those hospitable words of Turua, a young naked savage of the Penryhn Islands?

"So dense was the shade here, that the sky was completely obscured from our view, and it was only when I had arrived at a neatly graveled space that I observed a house, to which our path led. A little girl was busily engaged preparing a native oven, and a young woman was sitting in front of the house, with her head down, scraping some fruit. Neither observed us till we were close upon them. On seeing us the young woman, who proved to be Ocura (the young chieftain's wife), dropped the food she was preparing, and, clapping her hands, advanced timidly, and saluted me. She then ran into the house, and spread mats for us to sit on.

"Ocura, when she married Turua, was one of the richest heiresses in Omoka, being the daughter of a great chief, not only in that place but also in Mattonga. All the property came from her; for Turua, being a younger son, was not at all wealthy. Ocura was very ambitious, and was always stimulating her husband to take a more leading part in the affairs of the nation than he felt his position warranted, or his natural diffidence would allow.

"Supper was at last announced by the little girl. Turua sprang up one of the nearest trees like a monkey. These people climp better than any of the other islanders I had seen; and soon a few shocks on the ground told the little girl that the 'muco mucos' had fallen, when she immediately ran and fetched them to the house. These young nuts are easily skinned, and, the tops being broken off, a delicious beverage is ready prepared by the hand of nature; for there is no more refreshing drink than the water of the young green cocoa-nut, with its cool and slightly tart vegetable taste. The blackened fish-bowls were opened, and proved to contain my favourite ruché. A shell of 'neu oora' smoking hot, was brought in, and when the upper cover was removed, the little leaf was seen spread on the top to prevent the dust entering by the eye of the upper shell—a precantion that is taken only by very exemplary housekeepers. After washing her beautiful little hands in water poured on them from the eye of a large entire shell, used as a water-jug, Ocura brought down a small bag of fine matting, and from a number of pearl tués, or Penryhn spoons, selected one brightly polished on the back as as well as front, but not much improved by some rude carving on it. A greater treat was in reserve for me, namely, a couple of cooked 'utos' (apple of the growing nut), which I pretended not to know. After trying a piece, however, I suddenly clapped my hands in their own fashion, and, placing one hand over my mouth, exclaimed, 'Ka oaia, su more!' (Good Heavens, how delightful!), at which Turna burst into a loud laugh, and Ocura, in her delight, threw herself before me and kissed my feet."

At Tokerau our narrator is offered a fine buxom young woman, of about twenty, Roberau She, as a wife, and has some difficulty in avoiding matrimony.

At last he is driven into that happy state, and marries "Haka Moé Kokara," alias "the Sweet Sleeper." She is thus described: "She had large dark eyes, animated with a brilliant expression; her nose was small and straight, and when her bright lips were parted showed exquisite teeth, whilst her long black dishevelled tresses fell over and partially enveloped her graceful form."

Rubbing noses is the friendly mode of greeting between lovers and acquaintances. Our author's nose must have suffered considerably. The protrait of Chera Puma is a pretty picture; but in his third wife, Haka Puta, Lamont found a devoted companion.

Matrimony in the Penryhn Islands is as serious a business as it is in civilized countries, and requires some consideration. It is true, no clergymen is required; but if you rub your nose against your bride elect's nose, pat her on the head, and call her wife in the presence of witnesses, it holds good as it would in Mormondom. There is no court of probate and divorce, no damages asked or given; but if you marry into a tribe you become one of it, and your father-in-law, who generally uses a sharp-pointed spear instead of the little cane carried by more civilized men, would unhesitatingly run you through the back, or knock your brains out, if you did anything against the regulations of his tribe. Our author was forced into this third marriage. The young lady was violently in love with him, and the tribe wished it. We quote his own words:

"I felt sorry for her, but I was inexorably hard-hearted, and told her I should leave that evening. I tried to disengage myself from her, but, throwing herself on the ground, she clung to me, exclaiming, 'Cary coi ahana! Cary coi ahana!' (You shall not go.) She screamed for help, and not without success, for several women—amongst the rest, her mother—attracted by her shricks, rushed to her assistance. All things considered, why not take unto myself another wife? Having two already, I need not scruple about a third, and, so resolving, I raised my dark-skinned beauty from her recumbent position, patted her on the head, and, calling her my wife, said I would take her to Matunga; whereat, in testimony of delight she brought her nose in contact with mine, and treated me to an amount of friction which was more flattering than agreeable. Our party continued to swell till nearly the whole village had congregated; and when they heard the result of all the noise, the entire crowd returned in great joy to the hamlet. As for the little girl, she seemed overjoyed beyond all proper decorum, dancing along before the party, and performing her merriest antics for my amusement. Couriers were dispatched to bring in all the kith and kin of the bride and their friends. The marriage breakfast was not magnificent, although in the royal family. It is not usual for these people to make much, if any distinction on such occasions; and they have nothing corresponding to our bridecake—in fact, it was strictly an ordinary meal, the same as on any other day. The bride herself was not visible, custom, rather than modesty, compelling her to remain in retirement. After the morning meal, the different groups assembled round the chief's tent, where the groom and his friends were already seated. The men formed in a row for the pehu (ceremony), and the women, before sitting down, arranged their titches, that they might not crumple them, as they prepared to join the chant. The bride, meanwhile, had not appeared; and it was not till she had been angrily called, that, from a closed tent, some young girls emerged with what seemed to be a bundle of mats in the centre. This, however, was really the young bride, who, coming forth, ran toward the tent where I was seated, and then, darting back, was again enveloped in the mats and withdrawn to the remotest corner of the house. The bride does not entirely disrobe herself of the matting for several days after the marriage, when she appears with the titché, which she wears constantly for the remainder of her life. Whilst the young lady hides her maiden blushes under the matting, and the gentleman sits demurely, but more confidently, in front of the hut, the ceremony of the pehu commences, accompanied by rather an extra amount of crying, scratching, and bleeding, making a most melancholy affair of the happy event. The bride is then handed over to the oldest relatives or friends present for some future ceremonies, which over, the happy couple retire to their new abode."

Haka Puta makes an excellent housekeeper, but gets jealous of Chera Puna. She tells her husband she will leave him, when he observes she has no canoe. The brave girl replies:

"No canoe! No, true; but I can swim; the girls of Tantua can swim better than the men of Omuka, and I will swim back (ten miles.) You wouldn't give me a canoe, even to save me from the sharks; but you can keep your canoe for Chera Puna, and your fish for Chera Puna. Wa, wa, piki!—and you can leave me. Why did you not stay with her when you presented her with fish and cocoa-nuts? Why did you not keep her in your arms? Why come back to me? I don't wan't you. For shame! Go off to her now!"

We candidly own, as disinterested critics, that we entirely side with Haka Puta's sentiments.

We have not touched upon the adventures of the other members of the unfortunate Chatham, or on Lamont's desperate attempts to escape in a canoe of his own fabrication. The desire to return to a civilized land drowned every other consideration.

"During all this time," says Lamont, "I had never ceased to keep my daily watch for the ship that never came. It was approaching the season when whalers from the north frequently take a voyage through the southern latitudes to fill up with sperm oil after their cruise among the regions of the bight whale, which produces the common whale oil. . . . One day, as I was staggering along under the weight of a huge plank for building purposes, I heard, some way off, yet distinct enough to make my heart bound with hope, the long wished-for words, 'Te caka nue' (the great ship). The sound to me was a promise of redemption. Home, lost friends, past scenes, crowded on my mind, almost overwhelming my reason. Casting my plank from my shoulder, I rushed towards the village, where I found the natives running to and fro in almost as great excitement as myself, rapidly arming, to be prepared for any emergeucy. I was informed that a large ship had been reported by a canoe as having been seen passing the island of Tepuka. I begged the natives to launch a canoe on the ocean side, but could not get a man to lend a hand in transporting one across the island from the lagoon, where they were commonly kept. They availed themselves of every ridiculous excuse for their passive detention of me. Suddenly, I recollected having seen in Haka-Shusha, near the dangerous outlet to the south, a large canoe in such a position that I thought I might be able to get it into the water. Half frantic, I ran along the now naked sands of the inner reef, regardless of the prickly coral points and shells. When I got to the spot, a sail was distinctly visible keeping along the coast. The sight added fresh energy to my exertions, and, with the assistance of some broken pandanas boughs as rollers, I succeeded in getting the cumbrous machine into the water. Alas! all my toil was in vain. The canoe leaked so badly, and as the ship already stood well up to the southern end of Haka Shusha, my labors seemed doomed to be fruitless. Some natives approaching, I desired them to make a fire, and, having collected great piles of the withered leaves of the pandanas, I kindled them into flames, hoping to attract notice from the vessel. I also went out to some rocks at the extreme end of the island, and attaching my shirt to a spar, waved it to and fro in the expectation of its being seen by some one on board. When the noble vessel came towards the spot where I stood, I shouted at the top of my voice, which, however, was lost in the sound of the breakers. Oh! how my heart sank, and hope died in my breast, as I saw her glide rapidly from me. When she had well cleared the land, she again rounded to, and stood up along the western shore toward Sararak. An idea now flashed across my mind that some of our people residing in Tepuka might have got on board, and were bringing the ship round to Mangerongaro to my rescue. The wind was on her quarter, and though she swept along more rapidly than I could run, I pursued her with all the anxiety of despair. The sun had already set, but the crimson sky still showed the ship in black relief, when, panting with fatigue, I reached the Mangerongaro village. . . . . The light from her quarter, that for some time had flickered like a guiding-star across the wave, gradually disappeared. Fatigued in mind and body, I threw myself down on the beach, a prey to grief. A drowning man will catch at a straw to save himself from sinking. Fearing that the vessel might lose the bearings of the island during the night, I kept the whole coast in flames with pandanas, hara leaves, and boughs of palm. The long looked-for moru appeared at length, but no ship. The day brightened, and passed; the evening set in, and still there was no appearance of her. As she might have run more off in the night than she could make up in the day, I still kept the beacon-fires bright during the night; but the ship was gone. The disappointment completely overwhelmed me, and I became so savage that the natives feared to approach me. When I slept, they stole to the entrance of my hut, and, placing food before me, would sit down at a distance and watch till I had taken it."

Fortune favours Lamont at last, and he succeeds in getting on board another ship, the John Appleton, whale ship, of New Bedford, Captain Isaac Taylor commander: not, however, without a desperate struggle to get away from his dark relations.

The Lilliputian Fleet.—The current of blood in the body is the great inland route over which travels a fleet of vessels laden with cargoes of oxygen for interior use. It serves at once for export and import. The little red capsules are continually coursing in the stream, laden with oxygen for use in the most interior recesses of the body. Part of the load of this subtle life supporter, imported from the atmosphere, is at once consumed for work in the manufactured activity, while another part is stored up and accumulated for future use. The carbonic acid is the return load, put on those Lilliputain vessels, each of which is only visible under the microscope. In spite of their size—so tiny as to be invisible except en masse they are able to transport backward and forward four pounds and a half of oxygen and carbonic acid in twenty-four hours, without noise or commotion—to condense within themselves more than four hundred litres of oxygen from the atmosphere, and at the same time to give off nearly as much carbonic acid. And this speedy and airy work is not so much as guessed at by the observer. They export much more carbonic acid during the day than they import oxygen, and during the night, in quietude and rest, they bring back rich treasures of oxygen to supply the expenditures of the next day.

CARRIED BACK.

BY "GRIS."

It is pleasant to meet old friends, but exceedingly trying to meet an old sweetheart. Lavender isn't more trying to the complexion of a brunette. 'Twas in life's early forenoon that you knew her, when existence wore nice new clothes, dyed at the establishment of the rainbow. You quoted poetry to her by the hour, during moonlight strolls and drives, and recited various complimentary verses addressed to night's luminary by the poets, which you found in the Dictionary of Poetical Quotations, and committed to memory after hours of patient study. Sweetheart was in raptures, and said you had such a memory, you remembered everything that you read.

You wore Byron's collar's in those days, cultivated a raven moustache, spent a good deal of time with your hair, which was inclined to curl, and was mildly given to gin and water. Sweetheart used to pout with sweet reproachfulness as she mildly chided you for the latter habit, but it was evident to you that you wouldn't be half the romantic hero to her you was, without a little dissipation, so you never got a medal. You wrote unutterable poetry in her album, for which you was under lasting obligations to the dictionary above alluded to, and gave her your miniature in a crimson velvet case. You dreamed away hours and days in building atmospheric country seats, where sweetheart and you were the only residents, with nothing to do but wander amid flowery paths in unending moonlight, and quote from those impracticable writers styled poets.

"Years have outstretched their shadowy wings between." You didn't marry sweetheart somehow, and life's stern realities drove all thoughts of her from your head. You have only been reminded of her once, and that was when you read in some paper, long ago, a notice of her marriage. Having worn the yoke matrimonial yourself for some time, what you read caused no pang of grief. But now you are brought together again quite unexpectedly, and memory, expert telegraph operator that he is, puts you in instant communication with the olden time. Sweetheart has faded, of course; and so have you. As you doff your hat in salutation, you read a slight surprise in her look, and then remember that your hair don't curl any more, the cares of life have plouged deep furrows in your "Grecian forehead," as she once delighted to call it, and the scythe of Time has mowed away quite a clearing on the top of your head. You haven't an empty hair-dyo bottle even to remind her of the raven moustache of earlier days, and your sandy beard needs trimming sadly. As sweetheort laughs at some poorly executed joke (ghost of that once captivating wit) you perceive that she has lost a front tooth, and you never noticed before what a homely profile she had. You are suddenly and forcibly reminded that Time is "outo the wing,' and that you are growing old.

Sweetheart introduces husband to you, and tells him with a titter, which is a painful caricature of the girlish laugh once so musical and fasciuating—you compared it to the dipping of pliant willows in the running brook, don't you remember?—that you are "one of her old beaux;" then, turning suddenly toward you, she asks whether you love poetry as much as you did. Poetry! Stuff. You could put your hand on a volume of the Congressional Globe, and swear you hadn't read a line of poetry in years.

Sweetheart goes her way, and you go yours. During that day you attend your business in a wandering manner; you are scarcely yourself. The old days come back again, and you live in the past. But at night you go home, and the presence of your family, not at all visionary or unreal, dispels the unsubstantial fancies conjured up by unexpectedly encountering an old sweetheart.—Cincinnatti Times.

Uncle Sam in Paris.—Chom, the famous French caricaturist, in a recent number of the Paris Charivari, has made some capital hits on our wandering fellow countrymen. One cartoon represents a scene of desolation at a dinner table where a strong Northener and a fire eating Southerner are supposed to fight their battles over again on neutral ground. The knives, forks and champagne bottles are dancing around in the air, to the dismay of the other guests.

Another represents a downeaster in a private box at the Chamber of Deputies, who says to the janitor: "I mean to see everything during the Exhibition. Here are $50: just hire Mr. Thiers to make a speech now, while I sit here."

Another represents a long haired inventor, who is witnessing the fatal effects produced by the explosion of one of his torpedos on the river Seine. The experiment seems to be rather destructive of life and property, to judge from the wreck in the air. Another represents one of Uncle Sam's colored citizens, who comes out of the Exhibition every few minutes to have his boots blacked by Frenchmen, by way of humiliating the white race.—N. Y. Post.

The wheel of fortune must have belonged originally to an omnibus, for it is continually "taking up" and "putting down" people.

THE CHAMPAGNE WE DRINK. AN ILLUSION DESTROYED.

MR. TOMES, in his pleasant and instructive volume on "The Champagne Countries," which was noticed in a recent number of THE CALIFORNIAN, gives us a vast deal of information highly interesting to the lovers of sparkling wines on this side of the Atlantic, together with some opinions and facts that are rather calculated to put them out of conceit with their favorite beverage. He declares, among other things, that he has the testimony of all the chief exporters of champagne, to prove that the wine they send to the United States is of inferior quality to that generally sent elsewhere, and always to that kept at home. At Rheims he had abundant opportunities—of which he frankly states he pretty freely availed himself—to verify this statement for himself. "Brought," he says, "by my official duties into direct and constant association with the wine manufacturers, and partaking of their hospitality, I had frequent occasion to test, at their convivial tables, the quality of their champagne. I had hardly turned off the first glass, when I remarked a flavor of which my palate, though not unused to the best of Heidsieck Mumm, and Moet & Chandon, in America, had been hitherto unconscious. It was the first time in my life that I had enjoyed a glass of champagne, as wine. Before, I had drunk it as a not unpleasant beverage, being palatable from its sweetness and effervescence, and exhilarating in its effect. I could not distinguish the wine of one brand from that of another; and all—Heidsieck, Mumm, Moet & Chandon, Clicquot, and Roederer, seemed to me to have been brewed in the same vat, of the same proportions of syrup, brandy, and soda-water." Now, for the first time he recognized in a glass of champagne, the flavor of a really fine wine. His host, noticing his look of enjoyment mingled with surprise, said: "You don't get such wine in America;" adding with a roguish twinkle in his eye, "we keep it for ourselves and friends." Elsewhere, Mr. Tomes tells us that all the wine that comes even from the champagne country is by no means genuine, a fact which we should have inferred from what he had already said. There are manufacturers in the neighborhood of Rheims who fabricate wines from grapes never grown in the district which alone produces the real fruit. These will sell their concoctions at three or four dollars a dozen, give them as jaunty a look in bottle as the choicest Clicquot or Consular Seal, and call them by any name the purchaser may fancy within the limit of the law." But it is not to the manufacture of champagne wines alone that these ingenious artificers limit their skill; they make all descriptions of wines and spirits to order. While acting as consular agent at Rheims, Mr. Tomes tells us that he legalized "many an invoice of 'Madeira,' 'Sherry,' 'Port,' 'fine old Cognac,' and the 'best Holland Gin,' and of all sorts of liqueurs, 'Chartreuse,' 'Curocoa,' and 'Kirsch,' exported to the United States from Epernay, by an expert manufacturer of that place." The author adds that he knows the name of the agent in the United States, of this enterprising manufacturer and accomplished chemist, and that he would no more think of swallowing the contents of his varicolored bottles, than he would those of an apothecary shop

If, however, we untraveled Americans are not vouchasfed the privilege of tasting the finer brands of sparkling wine on our own soil, there is at any rate some consolation in the knowledge that what we do get is as good as we can appreciate, that in fact, the inferior stuff consigned to the American market, is better suited to the indigenous taste than that exquisite tipple, the first glass of which caused Mr. Tomes to experience sensations so novel and delightful, and to become so suddenly aware that all the "champagne" he had drunk up to that happy moment, was a mere sweet sickish "brew" of poor wine, syrup, and spirits. For Mr. Tomes is quite explicit in his statement that the wines most popular with us are invariably the worst, and he even lays it down as a practical rule that the consumer wishing to procure a really good wine should avoid those that are most in vogue, and seek some of the less esteemed brands. Clicquot, the favorite of our most knowing connoisseurs, he tell us is "highly brandied and sugared," and not at all adapted to the taste of "discriminating modern drinkers." In the like ruthless spirit of inconoclasm, he dethrones those other popular idols, Heidsieck and Mumm, the former of which is not in his estimation, fit for a civilized man to drink. But, as upon Mr. Tomes' own showing, we get the very article that we can appreciate, and that suits us, we cannot reasonably complain of the merchants of Rheims for not sending us something better, at least until we shall have developed our taste and educated our palates up to the European standard by a visit to the Paris Exposition—or what remains of it—and a tour through the Champagne Country. In the meantime, we cannot complain of being swindled or even humbugged by the wine merchants. They merely supply us with the article best suited to the undeveloped American gout. It is an undeniable fact that we relish our effervescent "concoction of sugar, candy, white wine, and esprit de Cognac," as Mr. Tomes himself did until he became suddenly endowed with "a palate" at the table of the hospitable wine merchant of Rheims. As, however, he admits that the champagnes sent here, though inferior in quality, are not deleterious, and are manufactured in the usual manner, we cannot help wishing that he had refrained from enlightening an ignorance which in a case like the present may be considered blissful, and left us still free to wax genial over our Mumm, and to eye with complacency the sparkle of our Clicquot, in undiminished enjoyment of the pleasing illusion that we were quaffing the same seductive beverage upon which it is the privilege of the aristocracy and the majesty of the old world to get boozy.

RELIGIOUS APPROPRIATIONS BY THE STATE.

THE practice of making appropriations of money by State Legislatures in the aid of religious incorporations, or for the promotion of denominational objects, is entirely opposed to the spirit of our institutions, and should be firmly opposed by all who believe in maintaining with consistency and rigor the American principle of the complete separation and mutual independence of Church and State. No matter how excellent in themselves may be the objects for which aid of this kind is invoked at the hands of the Legislature, the consequences of refusing it will be trifling indeed, when compared with those that must result from the overthrow of the principle involved. On this ground, our Legislators should take their stand when importuned for donations or appropriations in the aid of schools, hospitals, or other benevolent or educational institutions which have been founded by, and are under the control of any particular denomination or religious body. To this rule there should be absolutely no exception. Every departure from it is accompanied by a danger proportioned to the authority it may carry with it as a precedent. The principle of the rule is too plain for argument. It requires simply to be stated, in order to make the inconsistency of such donations with the spirit of our institutions and government palpable to every understanding. Our Constitution undertakes to secure not only perfect religious toleration, but perfect equality of priveleges, among all sects and denominations. To discriminate between them for the advantage of one over the others, is precisely as unconstitutional as to prohibit the public worship of others; and whenever a State Legislature makes an appropriation in aid of a Jewish, Catholic, Methodist, or Presbyterian college, or benevolent institution of whatever kind, it taxes a portion of the citizens for the support of a creed to which in conscience, they are opposed. It is in vain to urge that hospitals or orphan asylums under the control of particular sects do not come within the scope of this principle because no "creed" is taught and no sectarian influence exerted in institutions of this kind. Even if we admit the fact to be as stated, it is plain that the donation is an addition to the general resources and strength of the religious body to whom it is given, no matter in what particular manner it is applied. Five thousand dollars appropriated to aid a hospital, or an orphan asylum sustained by the funds of Baptists, or of Roman Catholics, sets free a like amount to be devoted to supporting a Baptist missionary, or building a Catholic convent. The particular object to which the particular sum is to be appropriated does not affect the matter. The five thousand dollars is in effect a gift out of the public treasury to a religious denomination.

We are glad to learn that this subject will be brought prominently before the New York Constitutional Convention, where we trust that it will be thoroughly discussed, and a provision inserted in the fundamental law prohibiting all appropriations of the kind alluded to, whether by State Legislatures, Common Councils, or Boards of Supervisors. The example will undoubedly have great influence in other States. To the example, set at her last Constitutional Convention, California owes the permicious system of an elective judiciary holding office for short terms by the precarious tenor of the political ascendancy of the party by whom they were chosen. If the present Convention should abolish that system, and also provide a remedy for the evil we have been discussing, it may be reasonably hoped that California will speedily imitate her, New York, in both these great reforms.

"PRENTICE" AND "DOGBERRY."

QUITE a number of humorous sketches, of sufficient merit to attract a considerable share of attention both here and at the East, have appeared in the columns of THE CALIFORNIAN during the present year under one or the other of the above noms de plume. The sketches entitled "Ravages of a Bore," "Travels In Africa," and those describing experiences in the mines, have been widely copied; and in the last number of the New York Weekly Review we find another of "Prentice's" humoristic pieces, "Our Dog," with an editorial comment to the effect that a new humorist has "sprung up in California," whose writings resemble in their spirit, those of Frank Bret Harte. So far as this remark might be understood as suggesting the idea of such a resemblance between the two writers, as is incompatible with the individual and distinctive character of both, it is not just. "Prentice's" vein is as strongly distinguished from that of Mr. Harte on the one hand, as it is from that of "Mark Twain" on the other, and it is impossible not to feel the original and individual element in the writings of each. Several of "Prentice's" earlier sketches were published in the Golden Era some years since under the signature of "Dogberry," and recently the same nom de plume has been attached to a number of his contributions to THE CALIFORNIAN. Of the sketches by "Dogberry," "Barney McBriar the Shootist" is the most salient and the most ludicrously extravagant. It also proved the most popular, and has been extensively republished in weekly and daily papers nearly all over the United States. The American Flag, a few days since, alluded to these humorous writings, and after stating the literary identity of "Prentice" and "Dogberry," added: "They, (the sketches,) belong to Prentice Mulford, Esq., a young gentleman who otherwise makes very little noise in the world. He is quiet, modest, and as solemn-looking as a deacon, but is, withal, the truest humorist belonging to our community of letters. That we are correct in this opinion is fully attested by the great popularity of his sketches on the other side of the country." We have made this mention of Mr. Mulford's writings under his two noms de plume, because we think it a mistake in a young writer to dissipate and fritter away his literary reputation by attaching various signatures to his different productions, unless there exist exceptional reasons for pursuing such a course. We would advise, therefore, that a "consolidation" be effected between "Prentice" and "Dogberry," and that in future Mr. Mulford attach his own name to all his humerous efforts that he deems worthy of publication.

A COMPLIMENT PROTESTED.

THE Flag pays THE CALIFORNIAN the highly flattering compliment of pronouncing its literary notices "the best reviews published in Californiа," declaring them "elaborate, scholarly, and elegant in construction," and "entitled to be accepted as standard authority." The Flag adds: "In fact THE CALIFORNIAN is a journal of position in any literary republic of the world. It is, perhaps, too refined and classic for general popularity; but if it be intended to attract the attention of literary men, and other persons of mental cultivation, its purpose is eminently fulfilled," together with some other words of praise which our modesty prompts us to accept rather as evidence of an appreciation of what we aim at and aspire to, than as an indication of what we have actually attained. Under favorable circumstances and with reasonable encouragement, we may hope that THE CALIFORNIAN will one day deserve so high an encomium; but we are sensible that to accomplish this will require larger resources than are at our command, and the support of a more numerous class of our citizens than seem at present prepared to appreciate such a journal as our unstinting eulogist describes. Could we clearly perceive the evidences of any extensive demand for a Californian critical and literary journal of so high a character as to dispense entirely with "stories," sentimental poetry, "gossip," and other kindred features, we should know no greater pleasure than to employ our utmost energy and skill in the attempt to supply the want. But we fear that no strong encouragement to any enterprise so ambitious, will be afforded until long after our fingers shall have ceased to hold the pen, and our place shall be occupied by successors belonging to the generation now in bondage to the schoolmaster.

"CRITICAL and Social Essays," is the title of a small volume published by Leypoldt and Holt, New York, and consisting of articles contributed to the first three volumes of the New York Nation. The range of subjects discussed is wide enough to embrace the National Debt and the International Copyright, tombstones and Timothy Titcomb, hymns and horse-racing. The articles are uniformly well written, and are characterizeb by a candid and impartial spirit. Some of the "critical" essays, are perhaps open to the charge of hypercriticism; but this is merely the natural result of a little too much zeal in a good cause—an excessive reaction in a right direction. There are, also, a few of them that seem a little hard and cynical; but the Nation, in its ambition to be considered a sort of American Saturday Review, seems to affect this spirit.

FIVE YEARS IN JAPAN.

BY FORBES MAITLAND.

NO 1.

The islands of Japan, four in number, viz: Nyphon, Qu Shoo and Scbo Ko Kee aud Yesso, the latter being the most northerly, lie between latitudes 30 and 40 north, and longitudes 130 and 140 east. They are a continuation of the group of islands known as the Looehoo, eommeneing in the China Sea with Formosa, which lies in latitude 24 north, and longitude 121 east. Of the Japan Islands, Nyphon is the largest and most important; of it, therefore, I shall treat first.

On the Island of Nyphon, are situated the two Capitals of Japan, Meako and Yeddo; tbe former being the Spiritual and the latter the Temporal Capital. Meako being the plaee of residenee of the Mekado, or Spiritual Emperor, and Yeddo that of the Tycoon or Emperor; when we add to the above mentioned advantages that of a superior climate, and a soil adapted to cereal cultivation, and an easy transportation of their prodnee to the largest foreigu settlement in Japan, viz: Kanagawa, my readers will at onee perceive the great advantages which the Island of Nyphon holds over its sister Islands Qu Shoo, Scho Kee Ku and Yesso. The Islands of "Heavenly Airs" is tbe translation of the word Nyphon; and a more heavenly island tban that of Nyphon would, indeed, be difficult to find.

On entering the Bay of Yeddo, its sbores lie on your left, while on your rigbt you have the Island, or rather volcano, of Ooshima, for it is entirely of volcanic origin. In the distance you ean distinctly discern the snow-capped, towering, inactive volcano Fusi Yama (17,000 feet above the level of the sea). It well repays one for leaving his comfortable bunk to watch the sun rising on snow-clad "Fusi" with its surrounding mountains clad witb verdure to the very summit, and the lovely valleys, clothed with the waving cotton plant, or the still lovelier green of tbe Paddy. On looking to the right you can just diseern the heavy volumes of smoke hanging over the summit of Oosbima. This island is rctained by Government as a State Prison, or more properly speaking, a refuge for sueh offenders against the laws of Japan as prefer to linger out a miserable existenee on this barren island to performing tbe operation of Hari Kari. On entering the straits of Uranga, one cannot but be enehanted by the magnificeuce of the prospect eombinlng as it does the truly grand seenery of Switzerland, with the verdure clad plaius of the Rhine, it is at this point the traveler first gets a full view of a Japanese village, with its snug little thatched cottages, each with its tastefully arranged garden, in the eentre of which is the universal fish pond, grotto, and rustic bridge, the delight of the younger and the pride of the elder members of the family, for however poor the cottage or its inmates may be, you are sure to find the tastefully arranged pleasure ground; perhaps it scarcely deserves so dignified a title, as in many instances the so-ealled pleasure ground might easily be sbaded from the effeets of the sun, by the outspreading of a medium-sized umbrella. The village of Uranga is not of much note, being merely a fishing station; the chief thing one observes on entering this, or indeed, any Japanese village, is tbe cleaulinoss of the people and the great number of children. Unimportant as the village of Uranga is, still here you will find all the dignataries of a city, it bas its Governor or Mayor, its Commissioner of Customs, and its regular police force. About half a mile from the village is a large Magdalene Asylum, erected sometime about the commencement of the last century bp a body of Jesuit Priests of the order of the "Heart of Jesus," it is now, however, entirely under the management of the Japanese Government, and to the best of my belief is the only institute of the kiud in the country. We now have a view of tbe Bay of Yeddo, without doubt the largest if not the finest Bay in the world, there is safe anchorage for vessels of any draft of water from the entranee of the Straits of Uranga right up to the city of Yedo, a distance of forty miles, while tbe breadth varies from twenty to twenty-five miles. During my five years' resideuce, I never knew of but one instance of a vessel drifting from her moorings, notwitbstanding we experienced several typhoons.

Tbe point now looming in the distance is Treaty Point where Commodore Perry in the Susquehana, along with the Missisippi, anchored in 1853, and here was signed the, by the Japanese, never-to-be-forgotten treaty of Hon. Townsend Harris, the cleverest and most unscrupulous diplomatist ever sent to an unenlightened, by an enlightened Country. Here was made the first false step in American relations with Japan; here the Japanese first learned the fatal truth that diplomacy was merely an elegant term for the most barefaced falsehood; here Mr, Harris assured the Japanese, "If you grant me a Commereial Treaty with your country I will protect you from the eneroachments of France and England; refuse my Treaty, and observe the consequences; Franee and England have a large land and maritime force in China. As soon as the war with China is quelled, they will at once place their combined force against Japan, wbicb, having no foreign power to intereede on her behalf, they will demand, and compell you, by force of arms, to grant such a Treaty as will bring sorrow and desolation on your land, and make your priests and staiesmen weep for very shame; on the other hand, grant me my Treaty and I, the representative of the Amerieau Commonwealth, I, the representative of a people whose country extends over an area far larger than that of Franee and England eombined, will intereede for you. I will persuade Franee and England to grant you time before you coneede further treaties, and, should diplomacy fail, I will protect you at all risks, and, depend upon it, Franee and England will think well and deeply before they risk a war with a eountry like the United States." Mr. Harris obtained his Treaty, and how far he performed his part of the eontract is pretty plainly seen from the faet that in a few months from the date of this being signed, France and England had similar treaties granted them on their own terms.

The settlement now opening out to view is the foreign portion of Yokohama, or, as it is styled in the Treaty, Kanagawa. Kanagawa was the port intended for the seat of foreign eommeree, but was deemed impractieable on aecount of tbe distance at whieh merchant vessels would have to anchor from the shore, and the consequent diffieulty in landing or sending off merchandise. Yokohama, a small fishing village at the time the Treaty came into operation, was adopted for the site of the future foreign settlement, not only because vessels could anchor within a quarter of a mile off the shore, whereas had Kanagawa been chosen as the commereial port vessels would, on account of the shallowness of tbe water at the this particular place, have bad to anchor at least two miles and a half off, not only for this reason, which was in itself sufficient to render Yokohama the more desirable spot of the two on whieh to commence a settlement which might, in a few years, commercially, compete with any city in China or India, bnt beeause it also offered greater facilities for building; there was a valley of some five miles in extent on whieh to build a city, sbould business increase to such an extent as to demand the extension of the settlement. Another, and perhaps still more weighty reason existed why Yokohama should be prefered, viz: its distance from the Tokaido or main government road. Yokohama is nearly four miles from the Tokaido, and consequently entirely out of the direct route of the large bodies of soldiers, offieials, etc., wbo are continually traveling along the Tokaido, either escorting some prinee or other high dignatary to or from Yeddo; whereas, had Kanagawa been adopted as the site for the future European settlement, foreigners would have been placed directly on the Tokaido, and consequently in a most perilous position, as in the most trivial matters of business they would have bad to run the risk of encountering the filthy abuse, or equally likely, the deadly attack of some drnnken offieial (Yakaneen,) passing to or from Yeddo. This is no matter of supposition, the danger which foreigners would have been exposed to, has been but too often, and alas, far too fatally proven during the past nine years to require any further remarks from me.

Yokohama was, therefore, although mnch against the wish of Mr. Alcock, the British Minister, adopted as tbe site for the future European settlement. Tbis port was opened to trade in 1858. Little or no business was done for the first six months further than the exebange of itziboos, or in the buying of kobangs and copper cash. A considerable business was done by one or two mercantile firms, who bad brought large amounts of Mexican dollars over from China witb tbem, and finding no produee in whieh to invest their funds, naturally enough invested tbem in that whieh showed the best per centage on the credit side of the cash book, although the artiele was, according to Japanese laws, contraband, and the dealer in it risked his head should he be so unlucky as to be discovered. As I shall, however, have in future frequently to refer to the native currency, I shall take this opportunity of informing my readers of the relative valuc of the Japanese eoins to the Mexiean dollar. Regarding the value of the coinage, my readers will please bear in mind, I speak of it as it was at the opening of the port nine years ago: Oobang, $10; Ko-bang, 1 30; Nee-boo, $0 70; Itziboo, $0 33; Nee-shee, $0 16½; Ee-Sbee, 0 8 1-4; Tempo, 02; Mong, (cash,) 1-3 of a cent.

I will now explain how the exchange business was conducted in Kanagawa, and how the foreigners profited by the iguoranee of the Japanese Custom House offieials. According to Treaty, eaeh merehant was allowed to exchange $20 per diem, at the rate of 311 itziboos to the hundred dollars, Mexican, whieh itziboos he could readily disposc of at 250 itziboos per $100, leaving a net profit of 50 itziboos, or $16 07 on every hundred dollars exehanged, so that allowing be only exehanged the legitiuate $20 per diem, be made daily the sum of 10 itziboos or $3 21, which gave him an income of $96 20 per month, or $1,155 60 per annum derived from the small capital of $20, and witb nothing to do for it but make out his application, take it to tbe Custom House and get his itziboos—a very comfortable little income to receive for doing wbat?—actually nothing. And wonld you believe it, the community of Kanagawa—I say community, because I do not except one treaty nation,—one and all complained of the smallness of the amonnt allowed to be exchanged! The universal cry the live-long day was, wby did our Ministers not make the amonnt $50 in place of $20? Then commeneed that system of false applieations, lying, and bribery, whieb was in itself enough to damn any eouutry in the eyes of a semi-enligbtened, but intelligent people like the Japanese. I, myself, know of first elass English and American houses having exehanged in plaee of $20, $2,000 per day; this was done through bribing the exehange offieers with a pinebbeck wateh, or still worse, with a worn-out Colt's revolver whieh, should the unfortunate reeipient have the temerity to fire, would, in all probability explode and maim him for life; but what was bribery, falsehood, or even life, in eomparison with almighty dollar? However, such a eourse of bribery and eorruption could not long eseape notiee, and the Ministers, after eight months, adopted the only course left them to pursue, viz: stop exehange entirely, and the outery was long and loud against sueh a measure; but what was the first shout of indignation in comparison with what followed when it beeame known that tbe offieials were to continue drawing their exchange; that the naval and military as well as the attachées of tbe different legations, were to continue to have the privilege of tbe exehange as heretofore. Then, indeed, burst forth such a roar from the Britisb Lion, and such a shriek from the American Eagle as never fell on the ears of a minister before; but the roar of the lion did not reach Lord Palmerston; neither did tbe eagle's shriek disturb the President's slumbers. The itziboo exchange was finished so far as the mercantile community were concerued; bnt the officials did, and do still, continue to enjoy the fnll benefit arising from the exchange business.

The above partieulars conuected with the opening of the first Japanese ports to foreigners, are given as a neeessary introduction to an account of the manners and customs of the Japanese which I shall give in future papers.

THE CITY GARDENS.—The City Gardens, at tbe corner of Twelfth and Folsom streets, are becoming a favorite promenade. New additions to tbeir attractions are being made daily. Tbe green-houses are filled with beautiful flowers, the collection of wild animals and birds is being coustantly increased, the croquet ground and bowling alleys afford much amusement, and everyone appears to enjoy a sail on the lake. Every Saturday afternoon a grand instrumental concert is given by Chris. Andres' band, and on Sunday there is a concert of sacred music by the same performers.

SONG OF SUMMER.

LEAF by leaf is Summer creeping
Flower by flower her glory reaping—
Harvest of the rolling spheres;
Cloud by cloud the sky is freighted,
And to every bud belated
They have stoop'd in dewy tears.

Day by day the flocks are keeping
Watch upon the silent hills,
And the noon-breeze there is sleeping
To the cradle song of rills.
Beam by beam the sun is stealing
Into hearts of all the flowers,
And those crimson hearts revealing
Something that's akin in ours.

Bird and bee have spread the tidings
Meadoward in golden swarms,
And the season's first rude chidings
Wanton now in wealth of charms;
All things worship, e'en the flower
Folds at eve its crimson palms.

Month by month the moon's intrusion,
As a spectre in the dark,
Moves in phantom-like illusion
All the vernal bloom to mark:
And the azure arch of hours
Measures out the Summer's dowers.

Night by night the sea of darkness,
Drifting shoreward to the sun,
Marks the earth with silent beauty
Ere the dusky round is run;
And the eye beholds in waking
New perfections just begun.

Pulse by pulse our life is fleeting
Where unclouded mornings beam—
Down the vale of years retreating
Like a white mist o'er a stream;
Soon a grave-mist will be veiling
All things in a long death-dream!

—HENRY H. CLEMENTS.

HOW I BECAME MRS. RANDOLPH .

I WAS in the garden, busily engaged in gathering a boqnet, when suddenly and unconsciously, I burst into singing some silly old love ditty which Hannah had taught me in my childhood. Never dreaming of a listener, I sang away with great expression and emphasis, when a light laugh from the front-chamber window floated down to me, and a masculine voice took up the same strain, trembling and quavering with mock earnestness. That provoking Mr. Randolph! I hid myself in the rose-bushes, and was silent.

"Oh, Miss Nannie," said he, "you mustn't end there; see how much more effective your song will be as a duet."

I made an attempt to escape from my hiding-place and run into the house; but misfortune attended me. My dress was completely entangled in a thousand briers, and it would not even tear and release me. I struggled away a few moments with angry energy, knowing that the young gentleman above was enjoying it thoroughly; and then, most provoking of all, he must come down to my assistance, trying vainly to repress his laughter, while I stood solemn and red, watching him as he slowly disengaged the folds of my muslin dress from the clinging thorns; and then I was obliged to leave not a few pink shreds hanging to the trees.

"What did you creep into such a bramble's nest as this for?" asked he, looking roguishly into my face.

"Why, for roses, of course," said I.

"But the roses were all gone a fortnight ago," said he, laughing again, until the garden rang.

And I walked, with a very hot face, into the house and up-stairs, finding the solitude of my own room agreeable.

"Oh, dear, how much I do dislike that Mr. Randolph!" said I to Aunt Phœbe, how in the world have I endured his presence so long, and how in the world shall I ever be able to endure it a whole month longer?"

Aunt Phœbe looked surprised.

"Why," she said, "I thought that you and Mr. Randolph were great friends."

"I don't know what led you to suppose that," I answered, hotly. "We ain't friends, and never have been, and are never likely to be. He's the most disagreeable person I ever saw."

But the disagreeable person for a wonder neither laughed nor said anything disagreeable at the tea-table; and seemed to have forgotten the garden scene entirely, to resume the thread of my story, and I was in a vastly more composed state of mind.

I was standing in the porch a moment, after tea, watching the sunset through the poplars, when down came Mr. Randolph hat in hand, and invited me to walk with him, which pleasure I declined curtly. But as soon as he was fairly over the hill, I ran for my hat and started away alone in another direction; for it was a lovely evening, soft and fragrant, and I always enjoyed twilight promenades. The evening primroses were just lighting their fairy lamps in the wayside grass, and the wild clematis creeping over the hedges filled all the air with sweets. I plucked a spray and twined it about my hat, and hummed a light-hearted song, as I paced slowly along, trying to deceive myself into the belief that I was really light-hearted, and thinking always of Mr. Randolph. Oh, Mr. Randolph! why could I not keep him one instant from my mind, when I disliked him more than all the world?

But let me tell you who Mr. Randolph was, and how it happened that he had taken up his abode under our quiet roof for the summer.

He was a young gentleman from New York, who came down to Roseville, in May, in search of country lodgings for himself and an invalid brother, during the summer months, and came by chance across our little nook in a far-away corner of a quiet old town; and he was so pleased with its healthful, airy situation, and the picturesque old gabled house, away from the road, up a daisy-dotted lane, with its wealth of roses and the silver poplars in front, that he begged Aunt Phœbe to take them in, for he had been told in the village that we had taken boarders the summer before. After due deliberation she consented, although it seemed very unpleasant to admit gentlemen strangers into the household. The two ladies who boarded with us last year were old friends of ours. But our purse was growing shorter and shorter, and the dear old place was burdened with a mortgage, and we felt that it would be best for us to do so. Aunt Phœbe would have shuddered at the very thought of taking borders five years ago; but since Uncle Ralph had died things were very different with us.

Mr. Lawrence Randolph, the invalid, kept his own room almost entirely, but the other Mr. Randolph, was everywhere; a handsome, merry young gentleman, and Aunt Phœbe thought there never was his equal in the world—so frank, so genial, so entertaining; but I disliked him from the very first.

One day, soon after his arrival, I overheard a fragment of a very entertaining conversation between him and his brother. The two came sauntering through the long barn while I was seated in my favorite nook on the hay, with a book, quite hidden from sight. It was the pleasantest place imaginable, that old barn where the swallows were whirling about in the sunshine, and the wind blew so fragrantly through the wide open doors, and I spent a great deal of time there, feeling so delightfully apart from everybody and everything, save my own pleasant thoughts, hidden in the soft, fragrant hay. I was aroused by hearing my own name spoken by Mr. Lawrence, distinguishing that from the rest of the sentence which I could not hear. Then Mr. George Randolph's laugh rang out merrily; and as they came opposite my perch, I heard him say:

"Imagine my falling seriously in love with a little country girl with auburn hair! I should have given you credit for more sense than that. She is very amusing, to be sure—pretty, fresh, and original. I shouldn't object to a nice little flirtation with her at all; but—"

And here they passed through the door, and I heard no more.

My cheeks fairly burned with indignation. What right had Mr. Randolph to speak of me in that way? Who expected him to fall in love with me?

"Amusing, indeed!" I thought, "Perhaps it would avail you very little, sir, if you were to fall seriously in love with me. I'd as soon think of marrying the man in the moon. Well let's see you enjoying your nice little flirtation!"

A city belle, under like circumstances would have forthwith laid subtle snares to entrap the heart of her unwilling victim, and, succeeding, would have cast it away with the most ineffable scorn, thereby achieving a most satisfactory revenge. But I was a little fool, simple, and unsophisticate. I tried to be stately to Mr, Randolph, but felt that I was making myself ridiculous, and it seemed to amuse him exceeding. Then I grew carelessly indifferent; I avoided him as much as possible without seeming to avoid him; and when we were thrown together I talked and laughed with him as naturally as possible. In those old days he was much more endurable than now. Now he was often moody and cross, and in his gayer humors he seemed only delighted to tease, and the angrier I grew the more pleased he grew.

One rainy day he had been reading to Aunt Phœbe and me in the sitting room from a volume of poems, and something that he read led to the unfortunate subject of love. Aunt Phœbe, who was a maiden lady, was slow to speak of it, but Mr. Randolph persisted.

"What do you think of it, Miss Nannie?" he asked suddenly.

Whatever evil influence sent up that burning flush to my cheek, I do do not know, but I felt myself blush deeper and deeper, and there were tears in my eyes; and filled with confusion at the thought that I was blushing so needlessly and foolishly, I could not speak for a moment, but at last I managed to stammer out—that I did not know.

What would Mr. Randolph think of me? And stealing a sly glance upward I met his eyes, which were fixed upon my face with a most singular expression, half-amused, half-serious. I expected a merry peal of laughter, but it did not come; and still I grew more and more confused, and pushed my needle through my finger instead of the cloth I was sewing; and glad of an excuse, I jumped up and ran away to wash the blood off for my work was dotted with little red marks. I did not choose to encounter Mr. Randolph's eyes for the remainder of that day. I wondered if Aunt Phœbe noticed my confusion. She must have done so, I thought, for she was possessed of very sharp eyes, but she did not speak of it.

Mr. Randolph very feelingly inquired after my wounded finger the next morning. I was sure at the time that I should hear of it again. Truly he was a most vexatious person; it was impossible for me to act myself in his presence.

In the evening I went out for a long walk by myself. It was almost dark when I reached home again; and at the gate I met Mr. Randolph with a great nosegay in his hand. Thrusting it upon me that moment, and without saying a word, he ran up-stairs.

"He is doubtless offended," I thought.

In a few minutes his step was on the stairs again, and I heard him tell his brother that he was going to the postoffice, which was half a mile distant in the town.

I entered the dim, unlighted parlor; and opening my old piano, I sat down to it with a sense of relief. I could play anything without being listened to or laughed at, now Mr. Randolph was away. It was a quaint, old-fashioned instrument, and had a pathetic, sorrowful tone, like the tremulous quiver in an old person's voice, which did not chime well with airy polkas, and tinkling waltzes, or gay, light-hearted songs, but was delightful in old airs like "Bonny Doon," "Robin Adair," "Highland Mary," "Auld Robin Gray," and a hundred other old things all "love and grief and sorrow," which I found in my mother's old music books.

Those containing the tenderest of love, and the bitterest of the sorrow, had always been my favorite; and I sang them with the most dolorous expression. I wailed out "Highland Mary" with broken-hearted emphasis. How Mr. Randolph would have laughed if he could have heard it! Then I took up "Banks of Allan water" in the same strain, and was just in the midst of a new melody, which I had caught somewhere, when I heard a step behind me, and, rising suddenly, I encountered Mr. Randolph.

"'The summer, it said, 'it will not stay,
And love will be left behind—'"

I had just been singing.

"Oh, I hope it will not be so in our case, Miss Nannie," he said.

"Hope that what will not be so?" asked I, confusedly.

"Why, you were singing that love will be left behind."

I tried to escape from the room, but he detained me.

"Nannie," said he, "I have received letters which call me immediately home, and I must speak to you before I go."

And so I stood and listened, wonderingly tearing the leaves which reached in at the open window with my nervous hands. I could never remember how he said it, or what I said in reply; but he asked me in some way to become his wife. If I had been a sensible woman, I should have told a hundred fibs in a breath, and sent him away with the bitterest scorn, to repent in sackcloth and ashes ever afterwards. But I was not; I was only exceeding foolish at the time. Of course I reminded him of his old speech in the barn, about a certain "little country girl with auburn hair;" but in spite o all, before we separated the next day, I unreservedly promised to become Mrs. Randolph.

And had I not surmised before this day that what I had felt for Mr. Randolph was love mistaken for hate?

ABOUT BEDS.—In France there are no feather beds—only mattresses, very soft and elastic, of carded wool; but the objection to them is that they are hot to sleep upon in warm weather. In England, among the middle and lower classes, feather beds constantly are the rule. A working man or a servant, when he is "about to marry," considers a feather bed one of the grand articles of furniture to be provided; and though, when the expenses increase, and poverty comes, it is pretty sure to be sent to the pawnbroker's, still it is the last thing to go—the bedstead generally is sent before the feather bed, and the family repose on the floor. Among the higher classes, feather beds are now disappearing fast; medical authority pronounces them unwholesome for children; and children are cared for sufficiently to insure that their beds should be what are most suitable. As these children grow up they keep to the habits of their childhood; and when their new houses and establishments are provided, feather beds are avoided.

MRS. LYDIA SEWARD, 10 Vendam Street, New York, says of the work done on the Grover & Baker Machine: "I think it has a superiority in durability. From my examining the work on other machines, I know that the threads in other will draw out when the work is washed. This is not so in the Grover & Baker; the stitch is more elastic in the Grover & Baker. The work requires no adjustment of the ends after it leaves the machine. * * * I have often gone from one kind of work to another without altering the machine at all."

[From testimony taken before the U. S. Commissioner of Patents, on the application for the extension of the patent for the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine.]

"Another o' Them Kings."—The filagship of our sqnadron, which lay last winter, a few days at Genoa, was visited by the King of Bavaria with his numerons and resplendent suite. The visitors were received with due style and speedily distributed themselves about the vessel, while the King himself sat below in the Captain's cabin. One of the gold-laced attendants stroled on deck and, to the astonishment of an old tar on watch, went up and leaned against the canvass ventilator which came up through the hatchway from the regions below. Before the sailor could say a word, that which the gold-lace man took to be a mast had yielded to his weight and let him ungently, down the hatchway. Jack was horrow struck, but dared not report the circnmstance to the officer on dedk for fear of consequences to himself, so he went on with his work. The next time he looked up, horror upon horror! it was to see the same thing repeated and another cocked hat and gold-laced coat disappeard abruptly by the same trap door of doom. This was too much; defying results and ignoring self, Jack went straight to the officer, and, as calmly as he conld, but with voice all tremulous, said, touching his cap: "Please sir—sorry sir—but sir—'nother o, them Kings down the hatchway, sir!"

REMARKABLE DISCOVERY.—A few days ago, while some workmen were excavating a cellar in Polk township, Monroe county, Ind., the workmen struck what at first appeared to be a solid ledge of rock, and, sitting down to rest, one of their number began idly to pick at an apparent fissure, when a block of stone, nearly two feet square, disappeared with a dull thump. The men set eagerly to work, and removing the bottom of the pit disclosed a chamber with a six-foot ceiling, and eighteen by twenty-five feet within the walls, which are of solid, neatly seamed stone work. Ranged in rows' on rudely constructed platforms were twelve skeletons, each with tomahawk and arrow-heads at their sides, ear-rings and bracelets of solid silver lying where they dropped, and piles of what appeared to have been furs, in the center of the platform, each pile crumbling to dust as soon as exposed to the light. A number of tools, made of copper, and hardened equal to the best cast-steel, were also unearthed, and fresh discoveries are constantly being made.

While trudging along one day, all alone, a soldier met a Methodist circuit rider and at once recognized him as such, but affected ignorance of it.

GRAND TRIAL
....OF....
SEWING MACHINES,

CONTEST BETWEEN THE
FLORENCE AND WILLCOX & GIBBS.

THE
WILLCOX & GIBBS
TRIUMPHANT!

At the Great UNION FAIR, held at Island Park, between Albany and Troy, in September, two Premiums were offered on Sewing Machines, one for the BEST and the other for the "Second Best"—competition being open to the State.

On the first day of the Fair, the Troy Agent of Florence Sewing Machine Company, having, jointly with the Albany Agent of the same Machine, entered it for competition, published in the Troy Daily Times a challenge to Agents of other Sewing Machines, to meet them at said Fair and compete with them for the Premium.

The challenge was accepted by the Troy and Albany Agents of the Willcox and Gibbs Machine.

Each party was to prepare and subject to the judges a "list" of the several "points of merit" on account of which "superiority" was claimed. These "points" were to be separately considered, thoroughly investigated and practically tested, by work done then and there, upon each of the machines; and then decided in favor of the machine which was adjudged to excel on that "point."

Finally it was agreed that the machine which, at the conclusion of the trial, should be found to have the greatest number of those "points" decided in its favor should be decided the "BEST SEWING MACHINE," and awarded the FIRST PREMIUM.

The result of the trial was, that the

WILLCOX & GIBBS WON THE VICTORY

and the prize, by the extraordinary superiority of thirty-five points, decided in its favor, against two points in favor of the Florence.

Full notes were taken of the trial.

It is a fact worthy of remark, that during the entire trial—which continued without intermission for nearly seven hours—not a stitch was missed, nor the thread once broken, nor a needle broken or bent, by the Willcox and Gibbs machine. No kind of work was attempted to be done on it that was not accompliseed, and done in a perfect and workmanlike manner; and no effort was made on it that was not entirely successful; while neither of these statements can be truly made in favor of the Florence.

This remarkable trial can not fail, through the facts developed by it, to be productive of important results. It has raised the veil and exposed to public view the true character of the opposition, who will no longer be able to deceive the public by misrepresenting the character and merits of the Willcox and Gibbs machine.

It is an improvement on double thread machines; and its "stitch," which was severely tested by the Judges, was decided to be much stronger and less liable to rip in use or wear than the "Lock Stitch."

It is the simplest in construction—does the greatest variety of work—makes no noise—is not liable to get out of order—costs the least money, and gives the best satisfaction.

Full reports of this trial sent free to any address.

JUDY (a literary thorn in Mr. Punch's side) publishes the following Tom Hoodish ballad o "John Guinness, or the Railway Porter":—

JOHN GUINNESS was an Irishman,
About five foot or shorter;
He was stout of limb, and he was called
The little Dublin porter.
Now, John he loved Maria Brown,
And louged oft to he hy her;
"How happy would I be," said he,
"If I could wed Maria."

But when he tried to tell her so.
He found his spirit failed him;
Aud then he drank such lots of heer,
That people asked what ailed him?

It happ'd that, with her traps and trunk,
Once came Maria fair,
To travel hy the Duhlin line,
To get some chauge of air.

On her the porter fixed his eyes
(His heart was reut with pain),
Aud douhlin' up his courage, ran
And caught her hy the train.

She jumped inside, and screamed aloud,
"Begone! I care not for thee";
He stood heside the door and cried,
"Maria, I a-door thee!"

He heeded not the station-bell,
But got inside the carriage;
He hoped to ring a sweeter helle,—
His thoughts were all of marriage.

"Thou knowest," said he, "I love the well;
Why need I this repeat?
And, on my sole, I lay, to boot,
My fortuue at thy feet!

"Maria, love, thou art hy far
The sweetest lass that could be,
And, by the light of Lucifer,
O! what a match we should he!"

"O! John," she cried, "this is some trap
For me to tumhle in."
"By Jove!" cried he, "although't is rum,
I swear it is no gin;
"By thy dear sacred self, I swear,
There is no art in me,
Except the 'eart hencath this shirt,
That heats aud pants for thee."

"Thy words," quoth she, "are all iu vain;
Thou hast been far miscarried;
For, hy St. Bride, I'll speak the truth:
I'm married, John, I'm married!"

"O! cruel, false, and fickle maid,
By thee, a-lass! I'm undoue."
The train heside the platform stood,
And, lo! they were in Londou.

AYER'S

AGUE CURE,

FOR THE SPEEDY CURE OF

Intermittent Fever, or Fever and Ague, Remittent Fever, Dumb Ague, Periodical Headache, or Bilious Fevers, indeed for the whole Class of Diseases originating in Biliary Derangement, Caused by the Malaria of Miasmatic Countries.

No one remedy is louder called for by the necessities of the American people than a sure and safe cure for Fever and Ague. Such we are now enabled to offer, with a perfect certainty that it will eradicate the disease, and with assurance founded on proof, that no harm can arise from its use in any quantity.

That which protects from or prevents this disorder must be of immense service in the communities where it prevails. Prevention is better than cure, for the patient escapes the risk which he must run in violent attacks of this baleful distemper. This "Cure" expels the miasmic poison of Fever and Ague from the system, and prevents the development of the disease, if taken on the first approach of the premonitary symptoms. It is not only the best remedy ever yet discovered for this class of complaints, but also the cheapest. The large quantity we supply for a dollar brings it within reach of every body, and in the bilious districts, where Fever and Ague prevails, every body should have it and use it freely both for cure and prevention. A great superiority of this remedy over any other ever discovered for the speedy and certain cure of Intermittents is, that it contains in Quinine or mineral, consequently it produces no quinsmo or other injurious effects whatever upon the constitution. Those cured by it are left as healthy as if they had never had the disease.

Fever and Ague is not alone the consequence of the miasmatic poison. A great variety of disorders arise from its irritation, among which are Neuralgia, Rheumatism, Gout, Headache, Blindness, Toothache, Earache, Catarrh, Asthma, Palpitation, Painful Affection of the Spleen, Hysterics, Pain in the Bowels, Colic, Paralysis, and Derangement of the Stomach, all of which, when originating in this cause, put on the intermittent type, or become periodical. This "Cure" expels the poison from the blood, and consequently cures them all alike.

Prepared by DR. J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, and sold by all Druggists, everywhere.

TO THE UNFORTUNATE.

NEW REMEDIES! NEW REMEDIES!

Dr. Gibbon's Dispensary.

ESTABLISAED IN 1854,
616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, Sao Francisco.

For tho treatment of Sexnal and Seminal Diseases, snch as gonorrbœa, gleet, stricture, syphilis in all its forms, seminal weakness, impotency, &c. Skin Diseases, (of years' standing,) and Ulcerated legs, successfully treated.

HORRIBLE DISEASES.

How many thousaods of persons both male and female are there who are suffering out a miserable existence from the effects of secret indulgence, or from virus absorbed into the system. Look at their pallid, emaciated and disfigured faces, and their broken constitutions, disqualifying them for the happiness of marriage or the enjoyment of life. In this horrid situation thousands suffer until death closes the scene. Let parents, guardians and friends, attend to those who are suffering with any of these horrible, life-destroying maladies—see that they are cared for and cured before it be too late. Send them to Dr. Gibboo, a physician who has made private diseases bis especial study for years, aod who is certain to cure the most inveterate cases without mercury or any injurious drugs. It is important to those who are afflicted, to be careful of the many pretended Doctors who infest all cities, publishing their skill in curing all diseases in a few days, imposing upon the public by using the names of eminent physicians from Europe and other places. Be therefore careful and make strict inquiry, or you may fall into the hands of these charlatans.

Syphilis is syphilis the world over; so is small pox, consumptioo, and other diseases, to the contrary of what quacks may say.

SEMINAL WEAKNESS.

Seminal weakness the consequent of self abuse. This solitary vice, or depraved sexual indulgence, is practiced by the youth of both sexes to an almost unlimited extent, producing with unnering certainty the following train of morbid symptoms, unless combatted by scientific medical measnre; sallow countenances, dark spots under the eyes, pain in the bead, ringing in the ears, noise like the rustling of leaves and rattling of chariots, uneasines about the loins, weakness of the limbs, confused vision, blunt intellect, loss of confidence, diffidence in approaching strangers, a disliko to form new acquaintances, a disposition to shun society, loss of memory, bectic flushes, pimples and various eruptions about the face, furred tongue, fetid breath, coughs, consumption, night sweats, monomania, and frequent insanity. If relief be not obtained, should apply immediately, either in person or by letter, and have a cure effected by his new aod scientific mode of treating this complaint, which never fails of effecting a quick and radical cure. Dr. G. will give $100 to any person who will prove satisfactorily to him that he was cured by either of the San Francisco quacks.

Dr. Gibbon is responsible, and will give each patient a written instrument binding himself to effect a radical and permanent cure or make no charge.

Persons at a distance may be cured at bome by addressing a letter to Dr. Gibbon, stating case, symptoms, length of time the disease has continued, and have medicine promptly forwarded, free from damage and curiosity, to any part of the country, with full and plain directions for use, for ten dollars, sent in a registered letter, or through Wells, Fargo & Co.

Address DR. J. F. GIBBON, 616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, Sao Francisco, Postoffice Box 252.

CAUTION TO THE UNFORTUNATE.

Beware of the San Francisco quacks and pretenders who with bogus sworn-to certificates, dupe the unwary. Some of the self styled doctors whose names are to be found in all the daily and weekly papers of Sau Francisco and other places, are tradesmen, and become too lazy to work at their trade. Some are tinsmiths, shoemakers, newspaper carriers, intelligence offices keepers, etc. Look over the San Francisco City Directory and you will find their former occupation in it. Look at the Directory for 1862-63. The only way to avoid impositioo is make inquiry—it will cost you nothing and may save you many regrets, for advertising physicians in eight cases out of ten are bogus, there is no safety in trusting any of them till you know who and what they are. Dr. Gibbon does not deceive people by exhibiting bogus titles, certificates, pretended patients' letters, etc. Dr. Gibbon Will satisfy persons who may call at his office of his ability to treat diseases that he proposes to cure.

☞ Persons writing to Dr. Gibbon will Please state the name of the paper they see his advertisement in.

BABBITTONIAN,

OR SELF-TEACHING

PENMANSHIP

The System of Babbitonian Penmanship is pre-eminently self-instructing. With its ample explanations of right and wrong forms—its sixty wood cuts—its plain intelligent rules, one may sit down by his own fireside and become a finer Penman than he could at much greater cost in the usual way with a living teacher.

There is a great demand for fine Penmen in the commercial world, and this system, at a trifling expense, imparts a skilful command of the Pen, worth hundreds of dollars to the fortunate possessor.

Penmanship is an indispensable accomplishment to Ladies, and this system is elaborate in a series of elegant copies in the Ladies' Style.

Business men have sometimes lost thousands of dollars from ignorance in regard to Business forms, and there is furnished in a set, without additional charge, a fine variety of Business Forms and Abbreviations. To sum up the Excellencies of this System, it is—

1—Scientific in its Arrangement of Principles;
2—Artistic in its Movements and Flourishes;
3—Practical in its Combinations and Applications;
4—Stylish in its neat and chaste Gracefulness;
5—Superior for Legibility, Rapidity and Beauty;
6—Most Disciplinary for fingers, Arms and Muscles.
7—Unexcelled for Comprehensiveness and Simplicity.
8—Complete and Self-Teaching for Private Learners;
9—Time, Labor and Expense Saving for Pupils and Teachers.

The Babbitonian Penmanship

Is published on durable card-board slips, ninety-two copies illustrated, put in a neat package with a Chart, the whole complete at the low price of $1 50.

Babbittonian Pens.

One reason why the country is flooded with poor Pens is that they are generally made by mechanics, rather than by artistic and experienced Penmen, the only parties really understanding the requirements of a good article.

The Babbittonian Pens,

Made in the most finished style, by skilful artisans, after models prepared according to the combined wisdom and experience of several amateurs and old Professors of Penmanship, are admirably adapted to meet the public wants.

The Babbittonian Ladies' Pen,

Is one of the most exquisite little instruments for delicate writing ever constructed.

The Babbittonian Extra Fine Pen,

Is pronounced by a large number of Penmen to be more free, more durable, and more varied in capacity for either fine or coarse strokes than any foreign Pen whatever. Suitable for elegant writing, it is a great favorite with the ladies and gentlemen.

The Babbittonian Business Pen,

Having great freedom and variety of movement, is unequaled for general business or school purposes. Somewhat coarser than the Extra Fine, it wears longer and moves more easily on paper.

☞ This Pen is now in use in the large counting-houses and banks in this city.

A RARE GEM OF ART.

"The Lord's Prayer,"

A pen drawing, by Mr. D. F. Brown, is one of the most remarkable works of art ever exhibited in this country. By patient labor he has succeeded in producing a design which for skill and beauty of execution, exquisite softness and delicacy of finish, and general merit, it would seem scarcely possible to surpass. The central figure—the face of our savior—is one of marvelous power and beauty. This and the faces of the Twelve Apostles, forming the border of the piece, are faithful copies from Leonardo da Vinci's famous painting of the

LAST SUPPER,

Re-producing, with the softest and most perfect shadings, the conceptions and characteristic expressions of the originals. Within this enclosure the words of the Lord's Prayer, in ornamental letters of various original designs and exquisite finish, are an interesting study of art in themselves; while appropriately distributed among these, miniture groups and scenes of marked events of Savior's life, copied from the great masters—five of them from Raphel's celebrated designs—form a harmonious completion of this unique, beautiful and truly wonderful work. The faces of

OUR LORD AND HIS APOSTLES.

Alone, so finely copied, would be a treasure to any house, and worth the full price of subscription.

"THE gravest beast is an ass, the gravest bird is an owl, the gravest fish is an oyster, and the gravest man is a fool." SYDNEY SMITH.

"I WILL roar, that I will do any man's heart good to hear me." A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.

"Nil falsi audeat, nil veri non audeat dicere." CICERO.

City Gossip.

We took a stroll on Long Bridge, a few nights since, and found it quite deserted of promenaders. You see it got into bad repute, so everybody left it, and consequently, it is now quite respectable again. The moon shone, the waves rippled and glittered in its beams, the little fishes below, had gone to sleep, the Potrero cars rumbled and thundered over the structure, the crabs crawled listlessly and languidly on the bottom, and a beautiful and heaveuly quiet generally prevailed.

No actress in New York, would consent to play with Ira Aldridge, the famous colored member of the histrionic art. Queer country this, that has laid itself out so heavily for the negro and yet refuses to play with him.

"What will be the result if the Copperheads carry California?" asks the Times. Why, a revival of the copper interests, of course.

A cigar store, on the corner of Kearny and California streets was destroyed by fire this week, and many thousands of cigars were prematurely smoked.

Tom Maguire caused the imprisonment of little "All Right's" uncle, for the larceny of $35,000. The Japan speculator was, however, discharged, and Tom rebuked by the court. So, to Tom, it was evidently "All Wrong."

A great many people went to see the big steamer Great Republic. After all, what more should there be about big ships than little ones, that we should so flock to see them? Well, why is a big man more wonderful than a small man? It is merely a question of size and tonage. And as a general thing, small men "stand the racket" and accomplish more than big men. So with ships. The Great Eastern was an unlucky monster. The Government felt quite sheepish over their great ram, the Dunderberg, and glad enough to ship her over to Louis Napoleon.

Great discrepancy exists in the accounts of the late Gorham demonstation. The torch light procession was grand, says one journal—it wasn't half so grand as one headed once on a time by Major Stratman, says another. The cheering was enthsiastic on the line of march—the people looked on with apathy. Curious we can't all see alike.

Keeler discharges himself barefooted again at Lincoln Hall next Monday night.

We passed our worthy Police Judge walking up Pine street the other day backward. "You appear to be backing up," said a passing acquaintance. "Yes," replied the Judge, "I never back down." Pretty good for the cadi. Hope he'll remember us favorably for this notice the next time we appear before him for libel, assault and battery, bigamy or any other little peccadillo.

At the late Union meeting at Platt's Hall the police arrested a man for picking pockets. On his person was found a portemonnaie containing a fifty cent piece. If this is evidence of the crime in question we shall not be arrested at present.

What pretty little sentiments were those borne on the transparancies in the late torch light procession.

"True Blues vote the Union straight,
They will never throw their man for Haight."
Charles Warren Stoddard.

"If you vote for the Democrats and Harry H. Haight,
The future is dark for our growing State."
John R. Ridge.

"The Democrats brought on the war,
Of course oppose the Registry Law."
Frank Bret Harte.

"The Democrats with money inclined to Bidwell, Got hold of 'Pitch.' Money will tell."
James W. Cofforth.

"The Democrats, so very hungry for office,
Will make short work of the State affairs."
W. A. Kendall.

"The Union Party is young and full of pluck,
The opposite side is Muck-a-Muck."
J. F. Bowman.

"If Gorham and the Union party will steal $5,000,000, Haight and the Democrats are ripe for $10,000,000."

We know not to whom this last should be credited. Rumor divides it between McCarthy, Pixley and Cox, chaplain of the stump brigade. The inference is certainly not very favorable to Gorham and his party, intimating, as it does, that they may possibly steal $5,000,000, if successful, because Haight and the Democrats would steal $10,000,000, should they get in power.

Mr. McGinnis got drunk in Oakland, was brought before the Court, and being found impecunious, was put on the train and sent home to San Francisco. So if, while on a pleasure excursion to the city of cows and hoarding schools, you become impecunious and want to get home, get drunk and home you will go.

Last Saturday night a police officer brought to the Station House a common dunghill fowl having four legs, instead of two. So says the Alta. Did he arrest that hen for having four legs? Hasn't a common dunghill a right to roam abroad with four legs as much as a horse or a cow? Why, our vigilant police will be arresting three legged stools next!

The Bulletin heads an editorial, reflecting on Gorham and his partisans, thus: "An uncleanly canvass." And Gorham calls the Bulletin "a dirty sheet," or something next to it!

The persons who disturbed the outside Union meeting at Platt's Hall on Tuesday evening, belonged to the Young Mens' Democratic Christian Bad Egg and Dead Cat Association, formed for the purpose of carrying the war into Africa at all Republican demonstrations. Mr. Haight is not president of this association, nor does he gladly countenance them, but they are resolved not to have him elected if possible.

Thursday's Flag has an editorial entitled "Who are the Men for the Times." Judging from the frequency with which the Times changes its editors, this is a very hard matter to decide.

Divorces seem on the increase. There must be a sell somewhere about matrimony. All goes well till the minister or justice pronounces the two one, and very soon, in many cases, they don't seem to be one at all, but two, and sometimes three, or at least a third party on one side or other of the house causes a vast amount of trouble. We don't know much about these things. Married men tell no tales. They are as mum as a newly fledged Odd Fellow or Mason regarding the secrets of his initiation. Like old fashioned dead people, they never come back to reveal aught concerning the mysteries of that bourne from whence no matrimonal traveler returns, save through much expense, trouble, and litigation. Married women say—but we must be discreet.

For the first time in many years a number of our citizens were able to make the round trip to Oakland without expense on the occasion of the Union meeting Thursday evening, an opportunity which many unterrified Unionists did not allow to pass unimproved. There was some fright in Oakland among the respectable, quiet citizens in anticipation of the expected invasion. Some familes moved temporarily out of town, and others fortified their dwellings. Yet all passed off quietly and another feather waves in the Republican cap.

Universal Suffrage.

Soon will the glorious day, when the right of suffrage shall be, indeed, universal, dawn upon this country. Negroes, throughout the land, are in a fair way to obtain votes, Chinamen may have them by-and-by, the hopes of Indians are not by any means desperate, and women must certainly, ere long, become politically the peer of man. There is, however, another large class of human beings in the United States, toward whose enfranchisement no steps have, as yet, been taken. We mean the boys. Especially do we urge the rights of the boys of California. We are sure that Mr. Gorham, who advances the fact that he is himself "a young man," as a reason why the young men of California should vote for him, will, if the matter be properly represented to him, use his influence to procure the passage of a bill, giving votes to all California boys over eight—or say seven—years of age. No one, who has listened to the discussions which daily take place in this city between boys of ages ranging from seven to seventeen, can deny that they are likely to exercise the privileges of suffrage in a more intelligent manner than either the lately emancipated field-hands of the Southern States, or the Chinamen of this State. We shall always object to babies in arms being allowed votes, but nice, little, intelligent boys, who read the papers, might certainly be enfranchised. It may be feared that their votes will be purchased for small quantities of candy, tickets to theatres, and by means of other bribes they may be corrupted, but this is a necessary evil. When full-grown Democratic voters are valued at $75 each, it is probable that seven-year-old voters may be bought for one-tenth part of the sum, but still, let all—or nearly all—qualifications of color, sex, and age be stricken out of the Constitution, and then we shall be able to see how things will work. There is no denying the fact that hundreds of juvenile political conventions are, at the present time, held daily in San Francisco, and that blood has been drawn from juvenile noses in consequence of differences of opinion with respect to the merits of the opposing gubernatorial candidates having led to fistic combats between the two factions. Let the boys have votes. Let stools for the small ones to stand on at the polls be provided. Population is the great need of California. It is just possible that in some instances California parents may be able to influence the votes of their offspring In this case, children will be valuable as "votes," and the cry will be "blessed is the man who has his quiver full of them; he shall not be ashamed on election day."

The Musical Candidate.

During the trip of the Yosemite to Sacramento with the political crowd which went up on Monday last, Mr. Gorham made a strong point. The Alta says:

In the cabin of the steamer were several good singers who enlivened the homeward trip by singing patriotic and sentimental songs. In such as had a chorus accompaniment the bystanders freely joined. "Marching through Georgia," "Rally Round the Flag," "Red, White and Blue," and other songs whose origin dates from the rebellion were sung with gusto. A quartette club sung several songs very acceptably, and then followed occasional solos, Mr. Gorham admirably acquitting himself by singing "Wearing of the Green."

By singing the "Wearing of the Green," Mr. Gorham no doubt gained many a vote. That's the sort of thing that tells. We don't want a starched, stuck up man for Governor, but one who can sympathize with amusements of the people. Mr. Gorham is a young man, (this remark has been made before, but it will bear repetition). Mr. Haight would not sing "Wearing of the Green," he would see his Irish supporters the other side of the Atlantic first. Most urgent entreaties of friends who are fearful of the effect of Mr. Gorhams happy familiarity with the public have failed to induce Mr. Haight to pledge himself to dance a Virginny break down on the occasion of his next appearance in public.

Mr. Haight, we understand, can play "Home Sweet Home" on the accordian, but in the most stiff-necked manner he refuses to entertain the suggestion that he should take an early opportunity to favor the public with this popular air. All this augurs ill for the success of the Democratic ticket. We fear Mr. Haight is inclined to put on airs. Mr. Gorham is a young man, he can sing "Wearing of the Green;" Mr. Haight either won't or can't. Under these circumstances, let all the musical world of San Francisco vote for Mr. Gorham.

Interior News from Interior Papers.

"The weather has been uncommonly warm during the last week." This item of news may be found in two thirds of our interior papers eight months out the twelve.

Another interesting fact common to their local columns is this: "We received yesterday from Mr. A., of Donkey Bend, a basket of the finest peaches we ever saw. We return our sincere thanks," etc. Then, again, the public are favored with another scrap of information to this effect, "Ale. We are again laid under obligations to Messrs. B, C, and D, for an additional supply of their very superior ale. It is an excellent drink for this hot weather, and is fast becoming a favorite with the public."

And there are many people who read these things soberly and gravely, imagining that they receive back a part of their yearly subscription in the announcement that "ale is a good drink for hot weather, and is fast becoming a favorite with the public!" Besides this, we hear that "The ice man has proved himself a benefactor this week. Without his daily attendance we do not know what would have become of us."

The ice man, the beer man, the fruit man, the man with mineral specimens, the man with potatoes, pumpkins, beets, etc., figure extensively in the columns of our country papers.

A Greedy Chinaman.

The Territorial Enterprise of August 11th, has the following item of news.

The Chinaman who, last winter, stole and swallowed a diamond ring, is again under arrest. This time he is charged with having stolen a watch.

We are not informed as to whether the Chinaman also swallowed the watch. If he did so, we should imagine that his sensations must have been very unpleasant during the time the watch continued running.

THE STAB.

On the road, the lonely road,
Under the cold white moon;
Under the rugged trees he strode,
He whistled and shifted his heavy load—
Whistled a foolish tune.

There was a step timed with his own,
A figure that stooped and bowed,
A cold white blade that flashed and shone,
Like a splinter of daylight downward thrown;
And the moon went behind a cloud.

But the moon came out so broad and good,
The barn fowl woke and crowed,
Then roughed his feathers in drowsy mood,
And the brown owl called to his mate in the wood
That a dead man lay on the road.

THE "CALIFORNIAN IN PETALUMA."

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF THE "CALIFORNIAN."]

The Beauties of Traveling—A Dissertation on Babies—Petaluma Honored—The City and its Surroundings—The American Hotel—About The Californian—Matters Political—A Literary Feat—Genius Cannot be Enthralled—Cyrus Ray and the Petaluma Public—Another Literary Talk—Concerning the Cow Country School of Literature—Work for the Wits and Satirists—Personal Gossip, Etc.

Bohemian Palace, August, 1867.

Messrs. Editors: I think it was the Italian poet, Ariosto, who proclaimed to the world that he felt more pleasure in reading books of travel, than in making them. Undoubtedly travel has its little inconveniences. It is certainly anything but agreeable to be awakened from slumber, at three o'clock in the morning, to take the boat or cars that are to start fifteen minutes afterwards; and, after the excitement of getting ready, find that you have just arrived one minute too late, and then plod about in a state of stupid lethargy for the twenty-four hours intervening before the next departure. Then it is not pleasant to find yourself elevated into the air some five or six hundred feet, by the explosion of a boiler; nor is it conducive to your physical happiness to find yourself with a pair of broken thighs, and a contused brain, as the result of a railroad collision. I am sometimes of the opinion that only men with wooden legs, and the smallest quantity of brains—enough to be a modern Senator, a gubernatorial candidate, a registration clerk, or the vender of pectorials and patent medicines—should travel by rail or steamboat, lest, unfortunately, an accident should happen. Again it is a fearful infliction upon the right to pursue liberty and happiness when you are compelled to ride three or four score of miles in a rickety stage, with a fat, flabby, ponderous woman on either side of you, a baby with the small-pox on your knee, a talkative, dirty tobacco chewer in front, and a small mountain of band-boxes, umbrellas and chignons in the rear of you.

Talking of babies leads me to express my confirmed belief that our women of modern times are not so fond of babies as were our good and noble mothers of old. To use an inelegant expression, they seem to shirk the baby altogether, now-a-days, and turn their leige lords into bearded nurses. Now, one of the great plagues of my own life is, that many mothers appear to guage my abilities as specially adapted to nursing, and consequently, wherever I go, I am perpetually plagued with, "Take my baby in your arms awhile. Do; that's a dear, good man." To use a phrase from one of the hymns of the historic Dashaways—"Who could resist this most plaintive of prayers?" Now, I hold that that mother has as much moral and legal right to ask me to perform the same offices for herself as for her baby. Great as my native modesty is, I believe I could sum up courage enough for the performance of such a delicate task; but, for Heaven's sake, deliver me from any more baby in my arms. To continue these tortures of traveling farther: Who has not realized the feverish uncertainty with which a man pokes his greenbacks, or his coin in between the mattress and the feather bed whereon he is to repose his weary limbs. He sensibly feels that human nature is full of moral, or rather, immoral, delinquencies, and knowing nothing of the antecedents of his room-mate or bed-fellow, he retires to sleep haunted by burglars, cut-throats and assassins. Fortunately, Bohemians have no troubles of this kind. I am only writing of that class of men who are, at times, unfortunately for themselves, compelled to sleep, or room, with gentlemen of the profession to which I allude.

But I must lessen the number of these leaves, or I shall get my readers into a forest of mental intricacies. So, merely mentioning that I took passage on the magnificent stern-wheeler, Relief, paid my fare, and felt happy in so doing, indulged in a fragrant Havana, perused Pope's clever satire of "The Wife of Bath," had a little nap, and finished up my recreations with hearing the woeful diatribe, "Will you, please, carry my baby ashore," I sprang ashore and jumped into a palatial buss, labeled "American Hotel."

WE HONOR PETALUMA.

We were cordially received at the "American Hotel," and then sallied out in search of Sam. Cassidy, of the Journal and Argus—met the genial and affable Sam, received orders to make myself at home; was asked to write a leader on "Political Immutability," but being mute on questions political, S. C. was compelled to put the harness on and get off a fierce string of invectives on the "Unterrified." By the way, I cannot help mentioning a piece of impertinence. While paying my compliments to friend Cassidy, an erratic, unshaven, uncombed, unwashed genius entered, and asked for your correspondent. On being answered, he, with a refreshing coolness and immorality, said: "Are you any relation to the old man Adonnis who had the little fuss with Venus?" Unable to master our rage, we grasped the impudent offender, and had it not been for the timely interference of my editorial brother, I am of the opinion that I would have been a whipped man.

PETALUMA AND ITS SURROUNDINGS.

This is quite a handsome little city, containing about 5,000 inhabitants, and surrounded by a splendid farming country. Among its interesting features, that is interesting to the Christian world, I will add that it supports a very good weekly newspaper—name already mentioned,—has seven churches, a college and high school, several hotels, a large number of stores, and some few manufacturing establishments, one of which is a lucifer match factory. The churches belong to the Baptist, Episcopal, Methodist (North and South), Catholic, Congregational, and African M. E. Besides these, the Spiritualists and Reorganized Church of the Latter Day Saints or Mormons, hold meetings occasionally.

The Petaluma College, under the management of the Baptist denomination, has entered on its second year. It contains 40 pupils, who are educated as they desire in the English, French and German, or classical departments. The school is presided over by Prof. Mark Bailey, and the preceptress, Mrs. Dorcas Clarke, appears to be a lady of large experience and fine attainments. The culinary departments, a very essential feature of all domestic arrangements, is attended to by Mrs. Lucy Gordon, in a style that combines taste with substantiality. Let me suggest, by way of digression, that most people have a weakness for anything pertaining to cookery. An old French philosopher once enunciated the dogma, "that the way to reach a man's heart was through his stomach"—pity he hadn't told us the better way to reach a woman's heart. Of this I am satisfied, that nobody can be a good student who is troubled with a weak stomach.

THE AMERICAN HOTEL.

While writing on the above subject, it appropriately follows that I mention how handsomely I am cared for by mine host, Emerson, of the the American, and his accomodating clerk, Mr. P. A. Paine. These gentlemen have fitted up my room editorial in a style far surpassing your best Metropolitan apartments. Everything conducive to my happiness is at hand. And I have such a splendid easy-chair to sit, loll, and write in, that I know nothing but tranquillity and peace of mind. I can safely commend the American to the traveling public as an excellent hotel, and my friend Emerson as one of the most affable of landlords.

"THE CALIFORNIAN."

It gives me pleasure to be able to state that The Californian is highly appreciated here, and its general tone and management warmly commended. The large number of new subscribers I send you is an evidence of the substantial appreciation of which I speak. Arrangements have been made by which The Californian can hereafter be found in Petaluma at the news depot of Moses Korn. Mr. K. is a thorough off-hand business man, and will especially interest himself in its wide-spread circulation.

MATTERS POLITICAL.

The political world in this vicinity is a seething cauldron in which the African, Chinaman, Digger Indian and Caucasian are mercilessly pounded by political butchers. Those intellectual gladiators and warriors who have taken to the stump seem to be profusely supplied with the choicest selections from the Rogues' dictionary, and very generously hurl them at their antagonists. Bad Grammar, bad tempers and bad whiskey have so largely entered into our politics that the most casual observer sees the necessity of some purgative measures, whereby to cleanse the Augean stables. All sensible people with whom I come in contact, appear to be really sick and tired of political warfare as waged in modern times. The indecent personalities, slanderous reports and assertions, and the general vile manner of conducting political campaigns now-a-days, brings the blush of shame to the cheeks of every honest, upright citizen. Until holding office be made honorable amongst us rather than profitable at the loss of reputation, we must bear the ills to which present political life is heir.

A LITERARY FEAT.

"Cyrus Ray," a literary gentleman, highly recommended by Brother Ridge of the Grass Valley National, and Brother Cassidy of the Petaluma Journal, essayed to speak a piece here a few evenings ago, in the shape of Readings from the male and female Poets of the Pacific, quotations from the Bible, John G. Saxe, and other celebrities. Like that modern literary lion of your city, the renowned D. Wemyss Jobson, Mr. Ray found the reading public an unappreciative, cold, clammy substance, impervious to the fire of genius, and incapable of soaring up into the great world of burning thoughts that travel round eternal ages, and grow the more transcendant as Time devastates creations not born to immortality. But our worthy friend and brother, C. R., must not be disheartened. Recommended, as he is, by a brace of well known editors, he cannot but succeed. The rays of genius are to be no more obstructed than the force of the thunderbolt—than the force of lightning that tears and tortures the very heart of nature. In the disasters which befel our friend Ray in Petaluma, he will no doubt be pleased to learn, on the evening following his lecture, quite a large and enthusiastic audience assembled on the priacipal street to witness a little unpleasantness that sprang up between a pair of quadrupeds of the canine species. Such, alas, is the weakness and perversity of poor, human nature.

ANOTHER LITERARY TALK—THE COW COUNTRY SCHOOL.

While indulging in a little literary gossip, let me suggest that we organize what is hereafter to be strictly known as the Cow Country School—of literature, and in this work of organization I hope to be ably sustained by the powerful and penetrating quill that has given such pungent vitality to the Dramatic Chronicle. Was it the author of "The Prisoner of Chillon" who satirized what was known as the Cockney School, and composed of Hazlett, Charles Lamb and Southey. Those gentlemen, in their day, made the Cockney School celebrated and Famous. But they looked through London spectacles, and became so saturated with Conkneyism, and so tyrannically opinionated that the wits and satirists lampooned them with caustic fervor. Now, the Cow Country School, proper, composed of Bro. Owen, of the San Jose Mercury, Bro. Ridge, of the Grass Valley National, and Bro. Gagan, of Oakland News, deserve a castigation. This school, too, is becoming opinionated and tyrannical. It looks down upon those pupils in the primary and more humble departments of editorial life with a shocking assumption of superiority. These gentlemen arrogate to themselves all the virtues, and credit their humbler country brothers with all the vices of editorial life. The struggle of man in this, the 19th century, is a death-like grasp for individuality, and we cannot allow the Cow Country School to swallow up, like a remorseless maelstrom, the individuality of the hundred brilliant lights now shining obscurely under editorial bushels throughout the State. We must protect genius in its infancy, or it dies from the coldness of an unfeeling world ere it reaches maturity. Lampooners, wits, satirists! Up and at the Cow Country School with a vengeance.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

Some lady, inclined to be waggish, registered her name as "Hagar" at one of our hotels, a few evenings ago, whereupon a certain ex-editor, well-known for his gallantry, called upon the fair "Hagar," but found her missing. He was somewhat dissappointed as he had brilliant hopes of meeting "Hagar" of the Alta.

Ex-Governor John Bigler addressed the citizens of this place, on the political issues of the day, on Wednesday evening.

In conclusion, I must add that I am deeply indebted to the Editor of the Journal and Argus and his co-laborers for repeated courtesies, and also to many other warm-hearted friends whom I have made and met for the first time.

Dr. Adonis.

Life's Allegory.—In the last chapter of "Norwood," Mr. Beecher's novel, Rose's father tell her the following pretty story—life's allegory: "Once upon a time a little leaf was heard to sigh and cry as leaves do when a gentle wind is about. And the twig said, 'What is the matter, little leaf?' And the leaf said, 'The wind just told me that one day it would pull me off, and throw me down to die on the ground.' The twig told it too the branch on which it grew, and the branch told it to the tree. And when the tree heard it it rustled all over, and sent back word to the leaf, 'Do not be afraid; hold on tightly, and you shall not go until you want to.' So the leaf stopped sighing, but went on nestling and singing. Every time the tree shook itself and stirred all its leaves, the branches shook themselves, and the little twig shook itself, and the leaf danced up and down merrily, it grew all summer long till October. And the bright days of Autumn came, the little leaf saw all the leaves around becoming very beautiful. Some were yellow, and some scarlet, and some striped with both colors. Then it asked the tree what it meant? And the tree said, 'All these leaves are getting ready to fly away, and they have put on these beautiful colors because of joy.' Then the little leaf began to want to go too, and it grew very beautiful in thinking of it; and when it was very gay in color, it saw the branches of the tree had no color in them, and so the leaf said, 'Oh, branches, why you are lead color, and we are golden?' 'We must keep on our work clothes, for our life is not done; but your clothes are for holiday, because your tasks are over.' Just then a little puff of wind came, and the leaf let go without thinking of it, and the wind took it up and turned it over and over, and whirled it like a spark of fire in the air, and then it fell gently under the edge of the fence among hundreds of leaves, and fell into a dream, and never waked up to tell what it dreamed about."

Superficial men have no absorbing passion; there are no whirlpools in a shallow.

AFTER THE BATH.

BY CHARLES G. HALPINE.

HER skin is moist, and cold, and pink,
But warm and red the lips I press,
And all her beauty seems to shrink
Compacter in her clinging dress;
While o'er her shoulders to the hip,
O'er swelling bust and far adown,
In trailing gold the tresses drip
Which form at night her braided crown.

No more her eyes in languor swim
But flash with keen, coquettish strife,
And every pulse in every limb
Seems kindling into radiant life;
Her cheek hath caught a ruddier stain,
And her small feet in sand that sink
Are marble-white, with many a vein
Down to the almond-nails of pink.

Her teeth are white as the shining surf,
Her eyes are blue as the bay in calm,
And her breath to the new mown clover turf
Is a rival in its fragrant balm;
O, happy sea that has held her form,
O, happy sands by her white feet pressed—
With her beauty the whole bright scene is warm,
Her beauty of gesture, and face, and breast.

Proudly she stands in her scarlet dress,
And my eyes give a quiver and then grow dim
As I gaze on her infinite loveliness
Of delicate color and rounded limb;
And the bright blue bay with its flitting sails,
And the silver sand, and the rocks of brown,
And the woods that are dark on the distant hills,
And the broad green meadows that slope adown—

All seem but a frame for my lady bright,
A frame not worthy her matchless grace—
Her lips of red, and her eyes of light,
And the wonderful charm of her winsome face;
O, here let me lie and die at her feet,
Let my soul in its sighs for her pass away,—
For my life hath its climax, and death were sweet
With her eyes gazing down on me here to-day!

My senses swoon into blissful trance
As her small, cool fingers touch my palm,
And through all of my veins the currents dance
As I feel on my cheek her breath of balm;
All the springs of my life are in her control,
For though features more perfect I know full well,—
In rich, womanly beauty of body and soul
There are none to compare with my seaside belle.

ECONOMY AND SUICIDE.

BY CHARLES H. WEBB.

"LET us go and hear Beecher this evening," said a friend to me, some two or three Sundays since.

Now, going to hear Beecher is a very good thing to do, and I'd do it often if it didn't involve going to Brooklyn. But this latter is as bad as a foreign journey—worse, in fact; I know a good many young men of unperverted tastes who had much rather go to France than to Brooklyn. If Brooklyn and Beecher would only move to this side of the river, how much better it would be for both! The population of the one and the congregation of the other would be materially increased, and then they'd be so much nearer to Jones's Wood, to say nothing of Elm Park. However, the evening in question found us on our way to Plymouth Church. Wearing good clothes, we had no trouble in getting good seats. The sermon, designed to inculcate economy as a Christian duty, was an excellent one, pleasantly illuminated by the speaker with illustrations from his own life and that of the Saviour. After speaking of the miracle of the mountain, when a hungry multitude was economically fed with a few loaves and fishes, Mr. Beecher narrated an incident in his own housekeeping which particularly impressed me. It was in the early days of his career, and his income was smaller than it is now. In company with his wife he occupied two furnished rooms up three flights of stairs. Precisely what the furniture consisted of do I not now remember, nor do I know that it materially assist the denouement of the story; but the reverend gentleman ran over the list of tables, chairs and crockery in his most graphic eloquent manner. One evening, at the close of a warm, sultry day—I condense the legend somewhat—a man came driving through the town with a barrel of cider on a cart, indicating a disposition to dispose of it by the glass or gallon. Feeling like freshening his nip with the exhilarating beverage. Mr. Beecher took a white delf pitcher in one hand and a ten cent piece in the other and started for the street, intent on purchasing. But at the door he paused. Economy stayed his elbow, whispering that he could not afford it; and back went preacher and pitcher—both dry. So impressed was I by this beautiful piece of self-denial, so touchingly narrated, that I resolved to go and do likewise—or rather like Beecher—the first opportunity that offered; to make economy thenceforth the guiding star of my life.

Unfortunately I couldn't well begin that evening. Seldom without an appetite except when invited to dine out with friends who live in boarding-houses, on this occasion the brisk trot to the ferry—taken on the supposition that the cane of the man behind me was an air-gun—and the sniff of salt air caught in crossing, made me unusually hungry. The door of a restaurant stood open, the savory smell of oysters, the sweet influence of stews was in the air, and I asked myself could I afford one?

On the whole, I thought I could. Never yet did I want anything which cost two bits and have two bits in my pocket that I could not afford it. So I entered, and very soon there was a pretty stew going on in which I was immediately interested. Anon, the devil assailed me in the shape of a soft-shelled crab, and I ate five. Repentant, but satisfied, I betook myself to my chambers, thinking how easy it is to make good resolutions, how difficult to keep them. Determined to retrench, I lighted a cigar and threw myself on the lounge to debate where and how to begin.

"New cider! Ne-w c-i-d-e-r!" I was startled from my reverie by the cry. It seemed a little queer that cider should be peddled about the street at that hour of the night—Sunday night, too, and the Excise Law in full force; but I was thirsty, and without stopping to discuss side issues—the question being a cider one—I seized a pitcher, curiously enough a white delf, and started for the door. But on the threshold I paused; memory of the late sinful extravagance plucked me by the sleeves; the stew stood up and the soft shells rose in judgment against me; I thought how nobly Mr. Beecher acted under a similar temptation. The man had halted his cart. "Cider?" said he. "Can t afford it," I muttered, and marched back, thirsty but triumphant. Setting the pitcher on the table, I reached up to turn the gas down a little—just as well economize in that, whispered conscience—when a slight brush of my coat sleeve threw the pitcher to the floor, and it was broken into twenty pieces. It was a new pitcher and cost half a dollar.

Wondering whether it would have capsized so easily had there been anything in it—cider, for instance—I took a drink of water, swallowing a Croton bug or two, and betook myself to bed.

At breakfast the next morning, while glancing over the customary cheerful list of suicides, murders, burglaries and seductions which form the staple of news, my attention was attracted by a paragraph headed "Death of a Family under Singular Circumstances." As there were only five in the family the item would have had little interest had not my eye lighted on the word "cider," several times repeated. Struck by the coincidence, I read the paragraph through and found that a cider-vender, his wife and four children had been found drowned,—their bodies much swollen—in a barrel of cider.

"How this sad thing came about," wrote the reporter, "human ingenuity cannot determine. It is vain for finate man to attempt to unravel the ways of an inscrutable Providence."

Prompted by I know not what motive—it was not that I thought the cider would be sold cheaper than it was offered the previous evening in consequence of what had occurred—economy had nothing to do with the movement—I seized my hat and started for the house of the inconsiderate cider-man.

It was indeed a sorry sight that met me when arrived there. In a bare and unfurnished room of a delapidated hovel, on a darksome street, a man, a woman, two girls, aged respectively eighteen and sixteen—scarcely sweet sixteen, under the circumstances—and two boys, the elder twelve, the younger about five, were laid out in a ghastly row. The inevitable reporter was there, with busy, business air, and had just written, "No cause can be assigned for the rash act," when a letter addressed "to whom it may concern," sealed with shoemaker's wax, was found posted in a crack of the wall. Investigation of the document revealed that it was written on the fly-leaf of some popular tract, the fragmentary title, "—member the Poor," being just visible. Whether the injunction originally read *Re*member or *Dis*member, none could say. The handwriting was bold, but jerky and irregular, as though done under strong nervous excitement.

"H. G. again," muttered the company, uneasily; but a glance at the signature dispelling this natural suspicion, it was determined to read the letter.

"I have seen better days," it began.

"Is it not wetter days?" asked the reporter, looking over the reader's shoulder.

Regardless of the interruption, the reader went on—"but those were under another administration. Formerly I had no difficulty in getting work, but of late I've had nothing to do, and a large family to help me do it. Such was not always so. Economy has brewed this batch of bier. My wife did dress-making, and turned all her time to account until her customers, one by one, informed her that they had concluded to economize—it was a Christian duty—and do their own sewing. My elder daughter had an excellent situation as cook, housemaid and laundress in a large but pious family. True, she did not get much wages, but then she had constant employment, until one day the lady of the house gave her notice that she, with the help of her daughters and an orphan niece, who was going to make her home with them, had concluded to do the work herself and save the expense of a girl. 'Economy was a religious duty,' she said. My younger daughter was engaged as maid to a lady, but somebody pounded a pulpit cushion to pieces a-laying down the virtues of economy, and the lady thought it a Christian duty to do up her own back hair.

"'I do believe,' said poor Bessie, when telling me about it, 'that if myself and sister took to shameful ways for a living, the ladies would think it their duty to do it themselves, and just step in and take the bread out of mouths!'

"My elder boy got a box of blacking, and for a while turned a very decent penny in the Park; for all that the policemen nagged him and told him to 'move on' whenever they thought there was a chance of his getting a job; but by-and-by the fellows that he used to shine up, before they went to meeting, for five cents, found out that economy was a Christian duty, and took to blacking their own boots. Little Johnnie there—the one with the red hair—he was hired by a toyman to set in the show-window and ride a spring rocking-horse all day for a penny an hour—extra compensation if kept at it after the gas was lit. But one day the toyman came down and said that he had discovered that a penny saved was a penny earned, and that economy was a duty, and so he took his own little boy out of school and put him on the horse and Johnnie off. Johnnie felt right bad about it, too, for he had become attached to the horse, and knew his ways exactly.

"Well, for all that the family was at home on my hands, I managed to keep things going by peddling cider. But all of a sudden the trade fell off; my old customers shook their heads and said they could not afford any. This soured us. Last night, I knocked the head out of the barrel, and we all laid our heads together—and you see what came of it. Johnnie kicked a little at first—he never did like cider, and he hadn't had anything else to eat for three days—but he got used to it after a while and drowned quite decently."

A "P. S." was added, short but carnest, with the last two words in italics: "Don't let them say that my wife was beside herself!"

Judge of my feelings as I stood beside the remains of that unfortunate family, mingling salt tears with the cider that woefully dripped from their clothing. "Guilty of murder—an accessory before the fact," I gasped, in self-accusing horror, and, with a nervous glance over my shoulder to see if pursuit was near, plunged into a dark alley-way. Nemesis, in a blue uniform, was behind me, and shouted "Stop! I want to take you in!" Dodging the officer's club, I made a straight wake for the Manhattan—peelers don't invade that sanctuary much. Felled by a sudden blow, I picked myself up and squared for the fellow, intending to make a fight for it——

Of course, to find that I had been asleep on the lounge, had rolled to the floor, and was simply pegging away at my astonished room-mate, who had just come in. (A story of this kind without such an ending could scarcely be considered orthodox.) That such a catastrophe as entered into my convenient dream attended Mr. Beecher's early economy in the matter of cider, I do not believe; but the chance that it might has counteracted, to a great degree, the effect of his excellent sermon and example. I have come to believe that, though it may be well enough to black one's own boots, it is better to give the job to a ragged-nosed boy, and, while he is earning his coffee and cakes, make a dollar yourself by doing something in which you can shine to more advantage—writing for the newspapers, for instance. Each to his own vocation, and depend upon that, though saving sixpences is one way of acquiring a competence, earning shillings is better. Patronize others, in all trades and businesses, as liberally as you desire others to patronize you; make all the money you can, keep as much of it in circulation as possible, and remember that the superlative of miser is miserrimus.—New York Citizen.

THE DOOM OF THE WORLD.—What this change is to be, we dare not even conjecture; but we see in the heavens themselves some traces of destructive elements, and some indications of their power. The fragments of broken planets, the descent of meteoric stones upon our globe, the wheeling comets, welding their loose materials in our own satellite, the appearance of new stars, and the disappearance of others, are as the solar furnace, the volcanic eruptions, foreshadows of that impending convulsion to which the system of the world is doomed. Thus placed on a planet which is to be burned up, and under heavens which are to pass away; thus treading, as it were, on the cemeterics, and dwelling upon the mausoleums of former worlds, let us learn the lesson of humility and wisdom, if we have not already been taught in the school of revelation.—North British Review.

DOSES of self-knowledge must be taken as cautiously as drops of morphia—an overdose may poison. Don't we all know how many men making money and reputation, living happily on the best terms with themselves, to whom a few extra grains of self-knowledge would infallibly prove fatal, and reduce to incompetence? To have ability, and to know the fact, may be an excellent and very effective thing; but to have profound self-reliance, without any ground whatever, is often even more effective.

OFTENTIMES the most costly thing we get is that which is given us.

LITERARY GLEANINGS.

A NEW VOLUME FROM JEAN INGELOW.

"A DAY of Doom and other Poems," is the title of the volume of poems by Jean Ingelow, just published by the Longmans. Of the principal piece contained in the book, the London Athenæum says:

"In the poem which gives a title to the present volume, Miss Ingelow evinced qualities not more genuine, perhaps, than those which she was known to possess, but certainly of a higher kind. 'A Story of Doom' is really a fragment of an epic. The hundred pages which it occupies bring before us the closing days of the antediluvian world; while the chief figures on which its sun rises and sets for the last time are Noah, his wife Niloiya, his three sons, Amarant (a slave), the impious Giant, and the enemy of Man, with his associates.

The beings last named inevitably suggest a comparison with Satin and his peers in 'Paradise Lost.' Miss Ingelow has judiciously determined to present the arch-fiend under a phase distinct from that portrayed by Milton, and the Prince of Evil accordingly appears here as the embodiment of subtlety rather than of pride".

The following brief extract, given by the Athenæum, will enable the reader to judge how far the imagination of the poet partakes of those high qualities necessary to one who would enter the region in which Milton and Dante, moved as in a congenial sphere:

But the dragon, left a-tremble, called to him,
From the nether kingdom, certain of his friends—
Three whom he trusted, councilors accursed.
A thunder-cloud stopped low and swathed the place
In its black swirls, and out of it they rushed,
And hid themselves in recesses of the cave,
Because they could not look upon the sun,
Sith light is pure. And Satan called to them—
All in the dark, in his great rage he spake:
"Up," quoth the dragon; "it is time to work,
Or we are all undone." And he did hiss,
And there came shudderings over land and trees,
A dimness after dawn. The earth threw out
A blinding fog, that crept toward the cave,
And rolled up blank before it like a veil—
A curtain to conceal its habiters.
Then did those spirits move upon the floor,
Like pillars of darkness, and with eyes aglow.
One had a helm for covering of the scars
That seemed what rested of a goodly face;
He wore his vizor up, and all his words
Were hollower than an echo from the hills:
He was hight Make. And, lo, his fellow-fiend
Came after, holding down his dastard head,
Like one ashamed: now this for craft was great;
The dragon honored him. A third sat down
Among them, covering with his wasted hand
Somewhat that pained his breast.

We will give one more fine passage from "The Doom," in order to render which intelligible to the reader, it is necessary to premise that "Amarant" is a beautiful girl, the slave of Noah. Japhet desires to be betrothed; but free maidens, alarmed at the predictions of his father, shrink from him with one consent. His mother now proposes that he shall wed the beautiful slave, Amarant, who is secretly enamoured of him. The suggestion inspires Japhet with the fiercest indignation. There is deep pathos in the following scene between Japhet and the slave:

And, lo,
The misery choked him, and he cried in pain,
"Go, get thee forth;" but she, all white and still,
Parted her lips to speak, and yet spake not,
Nor moved. And Japhet rose up passionate,
With lifted arm as one about to strike;
But she cried out and met him, and she held
With desperate might his hand, and prayed to him,
"Strike not, or else shall men from henceforth say,
'Japhet is like to us.'" And he shook off
The damsel, and he said, "I thank thee, slave;
For never have I stricken yet or child
Or woman. Not for thy sake am I glad,
Nay, but for mine. Get hence. Obey my words."
Then Japhet lifted up his voice, and wept.

And no more he restrained himself, but cried,
With heavings of the heart, "O bateful day!
O day that shuts the door upon delight,
A slave! to wed a slave! O loathed wife,
Hated of Japhet's soul." And after, long,
With face between his hands, he sat, his thoughts,
Sullen and sore; then scorned himself, and saying,
"I will not take her, I will die unwed,
"It is but that," lift up his eyes and saw
The slave, and she was sitting at his feet;
And he, so greatly wondering that she dared
The disobedience, looked her in the face
Less angry than afraid, for pale she was
As lily yet unsmiled on by the sun;
And he, his passion being spent, sighed out,
"Low am I fallen indeed. Hast thou no fear,
"That thou dost flout me?" but she gave to him
The sighing echo of his sigh, and mourned,
"No."

BY THE SEASIDE.

The "bathing season," is now pretty nearly over, both here and at the East, though at Santa Cruz, there is still said to be a larger number of visitors and "regular bathers" than ever before. On the Atlantic side, all the fashionable seaside-places of resort, have enjoyed a golden harvest, (metaphorically, for they still pay hotel bills there in green backs,) quite unprecedented. We do not wonder at this, for there is a charm surrounding genuine Summer weather in such places as Nahant, Cape May, New Port, and Rockaway, that is stronger far than that of the Kattskill, Niagara, Saratoga, or the White Mountains. The same seems to hold good here, for Santa Cruz, with its fine beach and splendid surf, has "drawn" better during the season, that the Geysers, or any of the inland places of Summer resort. A correspondent of the New York Citizen, who has been recreating at Narragansett Bay, is quite enthusiastic in his praise of the location. A bathing ground that is all that could be wished, a smooth beach, and no undertow, so that all who are able to swim, can strike out as far and as fast as they please without fear, elicit his unstinted eulogy. There, in company with his "chum," a congenial spirit, he throughly enjoyed his holiday. That he is a man of the peculiar temperament best adapted to such enjoyment, is sufficiently proved by the following after-dinner lines forwarded to the Citizen:

LOAFING AS A FINE ART.

My friend, my chum, my trusty crony!
We were designed, it seems to me,
To be two happy lazzaroni,
On sunshine fed and maccaroni,
Far off by some Sicilian sea.

From dawn to eve in the happy land,
No duty on us but to lie—
Straw-hatted on the shining sand,
With bronzing chest, and arm, and hand—
Beneath the blue Italian sky.

There, with the mountains idly glassing
Their purple splendors in the sea—
To watch the white-winged vessels passing
(Fortunes for busier fools amassing),
This were a heaven to you and me!

Our meerschaums coloring cloudy brown,
Two young girls coloring with a blush,
The blue waves with a silver crown,
The mountain-shadows dropping down,
And all the air in perfect hush;—

Thus should we lie in the happy land,
Nor fame, nor power, nor fortune miss;
Straw-hatted on the shining sand,
With bronzing chest, and arm, and hand—
Two loafers couched in perfect bliss!

Of course, any person who has ever idled away a voluptuous Summer month at the sea-side, will recognize the "atmosphere" of this nonchalent screed of verse. The following, written after a morning bath "with a young Nereid, who swam like a duck," is equally strong in atmospheric effect, and could not possibly have been inspired by any inland scenery or association, however sublime. We hesitated, at first, about quoting it, but upon a careful re-reading, we find that the poet has prudently reined in his frisky pegasus just short of the point where he seemed in danger of committing an indiscretion. Still, we would caution those of our readers, if any such there be, who are scandalized by the scanty drapery of the Greek Slave, and consider crinoline indispensable to decency, to "skip it."

Her skin is moist, and cold, and pink,
But warm and red the lips I press,
And all her beauty seems to shrink
Compacter in her clinging dress;

While o'er her shoulders to the hip,
O'er swelling bust and far adown,
In trailing gold the tresses drip
Which form at night her braided crown.

No more her eyes in languor swim
But flash with keen, coquettish strife,
And every pulse in every limb
Seems kindling into radiant life;
Her cheek hath caught a ruddier stain,
And her small feet in sand that sink
Are marble-white, with many a vein
Down to the almond-nails of pink.

The termination seems somewhat abrupt, and inartistic; but still, however incomplete, every reader, of taste will admit that it is a very neat and pleasing picture "as it stands."

But the poet seems not to have been content with his work in its uncompleted state, as we found it in his correspondence. He afterwards appears to have gathered courage to make "a complete thing of it," insomuch as we find in the number of the Citizen succeeding that in which the fragment above quoted was published the entire poem. We do not think that it is at all improved by the addition it has received, but of this our readers may judge for themseves. They will find the revised "edition" on another page of this issue.

Poetry is not always interesting in the ratio of its intrinsic excellence. Circumstances sometimes make it an object of curiosity. As a specimen of Hawaiian verse we quote the following, recently contributed to the Hawaiian Gazette:

FAREWELL TO HAWAII.

Farewell! Hawaii's Isles farewell!
To-morrow's sun shall find me far from thee;
But still, in after years the spell
That hovers o'er thee, ne'er forgot shall be.

And as thy fast receding groves
Grow in the distance fainter, dimmer yet,
Yon waving palm its graceful farewell moves,
And asks me never to forget.

Yes! every breeze that fans my brow,
Brings fragrance stolen from thy spicy sweets,
And o'er thy mountain-top in glory now
The gold and azure of thy cloud-land meets.

Sure ne'er was spot, beneath yon dome,
So blest with gifts of bright and joyous skies,
The changing clouds forever moving, roam,
And smile upon thee as they sweetly fly.

Ah, sunny, bright and verdant Isle,
Of thee in other lands my dreams shall be,
Of that bright spot where nature smiles,
A gem upon the bosom of the sea.

ITALIAN OPERA.

L'AFRICAINE, the great novelty of the season, was produced on Friday night of last week, and repeated on Saturday, Monday and Tuesday evenings, drawing on each occasion a crowded and fashionable house. The opera was mounted with all the splendor of scenery, costume and stage effect which the limited stage of the Academy allowed, and the famous ship scene in particular was a brilliant success. The music, though scientifically interesting, and in many passages grand and beautiful, does not appear to reach the popular heart; and we do not suppose that L'Africaine will become a stock opera in San Francisco for many years, as the great expense and difficulty of its production will deter any manager from taking the risk, now that novelty has worn off, until a new and larger generation of opera-goers will justify another experiment. The members of the present troupe deserve the greatest credit for the general excellence and smoothness with which the difficult music was rendered. Signor Mancusi, as "Nelusko," had the finest part in the opera, and filled it admirably. His "Song of Adamastor" was given with thrilling effect; and his duet with the dying "Selika" in the last scene was full of a certain tenderness which we have often noticed in his voice, and in which he has had no equal here within our recollection. "Selika," the Indian Princess, was personated by Signorina Brambilla, who sang the music with her usual artistic delicacy and correctness; but the part gives her few opportunities for the display of brillant execution, and the dress and complexion are not particularly favorable to the general effect. Mme. Stella Bonheur acted and sang the part of "Inez" with great dramatic expression. Signor Milleri gave a powerful and satisfactory impersonation of "Don Pedro," and Signor Limberti was tolerable as "Vasco di Gama." The minor characters were well sustained, and the chorus and orchestra, both enlarged for the occasion, did their share of the performance in a style which deserves great praise.

On Wednesday evening La Favorita was given for the benefit of Mme. Stella Bonheur, to a brilliant and overflowing house. The fair beneficiary was received with tumultuous enthusiasm, and sang the part of "Leonora" with great effect. Crispino e la Comare was given last night, for the benefit of Signor Mancusi, to an immense audience; and constituted the closing performance of the season. We hope that further arrangements may be made with the artists, as it seems now a favorable opportunity to commence a new season, and to restore the musical credit of our city; which has suffered from the fact that an unusual number of our regular opera goers have been spending this summer in the country. We think that a season of four weeks, at least, might be given at this time, with a result equally satisfactory to the management and the public.

MARKET IMPROVEMENT.—Passages have been cut through the brick wall heretofore dividing the Metropolitan and Occidental Markets, and those two large and popular markets may now be considered as one. FIVE YEARS IN JAPAN.

BY FORBES MAITLAND.

No. II.

ALTHOUGH it is well known that Japan has been fully open to foreigners for some twelve or thirteen years, many persons may not be aware of the fact, that Nagasaki, or rather the island of Desima,* situated on the Island of Qu Schoo, which pays tribute to the Tycoon, has been settled by the Dutch for the past hundred years. Here the unfortunate Hollandais—as the Japanese Frenchify the name—remained in a state of semi-imprisonment for a space of almost one hundred years, receiving their two cargoes per year, and that privilege being only granted them in consideration of their tramp. ling on the Cross of our Saviour on each Christmas day. On entering the Bay of Nagasaki, the first high land one observes is Papindike Bluff, from which the Jesuit priests were compelled to make the grand leap.

The Dutch had no communication whatever with the interior of Japan until the American Treaty of 1853.

The Dutch certainly deserve praise for the manner in which they adhered to their small island, notwithstanding the great difficulties placed in their way by the Japanese Government. In these days, when one can see Japanese dining at any restaurant, one can hardly credit that but a few short years have elapsed since Japan was a comparatively unknown country, for, as it was, the employés of the Dutch Trading Company were obliged to show even their private letters to a government interpreter before they were sent to China, lest any information regarding the country should reach the outside barbarians. In 1854, this port was opened to English and American trade. The countries did a large business for the first two years, since which time the port has gradually decreased in a commercial point.

It was from this port that a Frenchman attempted the abduction of a young lady in the dress of a China boy, nor did the Custom House officers discover the fraud practised on them until after the vessel had sailed from the port, when they requested the English Consul to send the only man-of-war in the harbor in pursuit of the runaway. The schooner, however, having some eight hours start got clear away, and the vessel of war had to make the trip to China and remain at the mouth of the Woo Sung until such a time as the Zephyr should arrive. The English Consul communicated the fact to the owners of the vessel, and she was sent back without discharging a pound of her cargo. The unfortunate girl was handed over to the tender mercies of the Japanese Government, by whom she was tortured to death in the most cruel manner, viz: by being lashed to a pole, exposed to a broiling sun with cold water contiuually dropping on her head. Not satisfied with her death they also killed her relatives, thereby visiting the sins of the child on the father; yes, even the grandfather of her who had been so vile as to leave her native land with a barbarian!

The principal exports from Nagasaki are tea and chow-chow, with a small quantity of silk and tobacco, the former being of an inferior quality to that exported from Yokohama.

I will now give a short description of Simoda, at which port the Hon. Mr. Harris remained until the time when his Treaty was ratified. This port is situated on the southern side of the Island of Nyphon; it is of little note, being merely a fishing village. In fact, it is a place one would never have heard of, had it not been for two great events—the earthquake of 1853, and the arrival of Mr. Harris, neither of which materially benefitted the port. It did have a very convenient harbor, and numbers of whaling vessels used to call there for supplies, but, unfortunately, the earthquake threw up a large body of rock which almost blocked up the entrance.

I visited this port in 1860; the remains of the town were still visible, as was also the flag-pole over Mr. Harris' residence, which my Japanese guide pointed out as the "American Tycoon no uchi." Having mentioned the only two events which ever did, in my belief, occur in Simoda, I will now proceed to Yokohama.

This is the European settlement of Japan. The principal exports are tea and silk, with small quantities of tobacco, copper, oil and wax. Matters were rather unsettled here for the first four years, partly owing to the dislike of the Japanese to foreigners, and a good deal to the mismanagement of the Consuls and Ministers. This port had far from a prepossessing appearance, when first opened, with its dozen of miserable nanties erected by government for the accommodation of Treaty powers. The Japanese opened the ball here by cutting down two Russians, one of whom was a naval officer, the other a quartermaster. The murderers, on this occasion, escaped. This was followed by the assassination of Mr. Hewlin, Dutch interpreter to the American Legation, who was cut down coming from the Dutch Legation where he had been dining, he, at the time having a guard of some twelve Japanese officials. The murderers, as on the previous occasion escaped. About twelve months after this, two Dutch captains were killed in the principal street, not more than fifty yards from the European Hotel; strange as it may seem, the murderers again escaped.

The most sad record of European pioneering in Japan is the murder of Mr. Richardson, who was cut down on the Tokaido while in company with three friends, (one a lady) who barely escaped with their lives. One of the gentlemen received some seven wounds, and the other four, one cut almost severing the left arm at the shoulder; the lady fortunately escaped with the loss of her back hair, which was cut as clean off as if it had been shaved. Never, perhaps, was such excitement witnessed in a community as there was in Yokohama on that Sunday afternoon, when the rumor arrived that three foreign gentlemen and a lady had been murdered, (for such was the first report) not eight miles from Yokohoma! Strange to say, almost at the same instant H. B. M. Sloop-of-war Euryalus, bearing the flag of Admiral Kuper, was signaled off Treaty Point, inward bound. About half past four o'clock Mrs. Borradale was seen riding furiously down the main street with what was left of her hair flying in the wind. Her dress was deluged in blood, and a frightful gash appeared on the hind-quarters of her horse, which was all but used up. Then the news spread that Richardson was killed, and his body left to the mercies of the Japanese, but that the other two had escaped with a few sword and spear wounds.

I do not think I shall soon forget that afternoon and night, expecting as we did, hourly, an attack on the settlement; with but a handful of men to protect us, we could have made but a poor defence against above ten thousand. In defiance, however, of the crowd we had to face, and spite our limited numbers, we were determined to recover the body of our murdered countryman. Having summoned the community together we proceeded along the Tokaid toward Yeddoo. At about six miles from Yokohama we found the body of the unfortunate gentleman, which, after being mangled in the most frightful manner, had been carried a short distance from the road and there left. The remains we brought into the settlement, and interred with military honors the next day. Many European papers have blamed Mr. Richardson and party for not leaving the road when the first Yokoneen (officor) called to them "Pecki, Pecki," (Pigion Japanese, signifying get away.) but the fact was they could not possibly get off the road at this particular spot. So much, however, has been written pro and con on this sad affair that I will not make further remarks on it, but proceed in a northerly direction to Hakodadi.

Hakodadi is the most northerly port at present open in Japan. It is situated on the Island of Yesso, and was opened to trade at the same time as Yokohama. The trade at this port has been but limited; consisting almost entirely of sea weed (for Chinese consumption,) and timber, with now and again a small quantity of silk.

On the Island of Yesso reside a tribe of Semi-Japanese called Ino's, they are subject to the Tycoon. They do not, however, resemble the Japanese either in appearance or manners. Perhaps there are few races of whom so little is known as of the Ino's, speaking as they do an entirely different language from the Japanese proper. They have no idea whatever of European commerce, and exist chiefly on fish and sea weed. As an example of how little is known of them either at home or abroad, I may mention that a London physician gave twenty pounds for the skull of one of these people a few months ago. The British Consul at Hakodadi got himself into rather a serious scrape by procuring an Ino's skull for a friend of his. He sent his constable out to the burial ground to obtain it, and he not having properly covered up the grave after disinterring the body, the sacrilege was reported to the British Minister at Yokohama, who kicked up a great fuss about it and ordered the Consul down to Yokohama to hold a court of inquiry. The most ridiculous part, however, remains to be told, the Japanese finding that an Ino's skull was so highly prized by Europeans, actually made them an article of merchandise, and at present, although not quoted in the monthly price currents, they can be bought for one dollar apiece. I shall refer more fully to characteristics of this peculiar people in a future article.

*The neck of land known as Desima was originally attached to the main ıd, and is still considered by the Japanese as part of the Island of Qu ıoo, although a broad ditch having been cut across one end, makes it, to ıntents, an Island, the only communication with the shore being over a ıe bridge, which was continually guarded, thus completely isolating the ch, and preventing them from having any intercourse with the natives, ess such as had permission from the Government.

DRAMATIC AFFAIRS.

THE popular comedy of Wild Oats was played on Monday at Magnire's Opera House. Romeo and Juliet was promised on Tuesday, but in consequence of the sickness of Mrs. Sophie Edwin Wild Oats was repeated, with Miss Sallie Hinckley in the part of "Lady Amaranth," which she played very well, considering the fact that she had but a few hours in which to study it. On Wednesday, The Lady of Lyons was presented, Edwin Adams playing "Claude Melnotte," and Miss Sallie Hinckley appearing as "Pauline." Mr. Adams is not so happy in his rendition of the part of "Claude Melnotte" as he is in many other characters. In this, the faults of his style of acting are brought prominently under observation; he too often pumps his breath up from the bottom of his chest before giving utterance to passionate passages, and indulges in too much shaking of the head. This part is seldom well-played, and when it is is not worth much. On Tuesday, The Ticket of Leave Man was played. This play was cast so perfectly and was so excellently played on the night of its first production at Maguire's Opera House, that no room for improvement was left. Mr. Adams is not as well suited to the character of "Robert Brierly" as is Frank Mayo. Miss Sallie Hinckley, though she played the part of "May Edwards" very well, could not, of course, be expected to equal Mrs. Sophie Edwin. McCullough, too, was not equal to Charley Thorne in "Hawkshaw." Miss Alicia Mandeville, as "Sam Willoughby," was not equal to Mrs. H. A. Perry—in fact, as I before stated, the cast was inferior to the original one in many parts. It was, however, well played, and those who had not seen it played before and were therefore unable to make comparisons, thoroughly enjoyed it. The applause was loud and frequent. John McCullough had a good benefit last night—he has well earned it by the able manner in which he has supported Mr. Adams through his engagement. Damon and Pythias and The Honeymoon constituted the bill. Mrs. Edwin having recovered from her illness, appeared last night in the characters of "Hermion" and "Juliana." This afternoon Romeo and Juliet will be performed. The evening's entertainment will consist of The Ticket of Leave Man. Next week is the last of the engagement of Mr. Adams. Every night during the week the house has been crowded.

On Monday evening Lady Audley's Secret was performed at the Metropolitan Theatre, when Mrs. Harry Jackson delighted all present by her inimitable impersonation of the heroine. The manner in which she accomplished the transitions from passion to calm, and simulation of incipient madness were extremely artistic. She was well supported. Miss Clelia Howson deserves credit for the power she evinced and the generally correct manner in which she performed the character of "Alicia." On Tuesday Janet Pride was performed for the benefit of Mrs. Harry Jackson; it was excellently played, but in consequence of the political excitement which reigned on that evening, the public did not respond in the manner which the merit of beneficiary demanded. It was repeated on the following night.

On Thursday, the capital comedy of Married Life was performed for the benefit of the McKenzie Zouaves. Last night, the Willow Copse was performed. This afternoon, a matinee will be given, when Mrs. Harry Jackson will appear in her great character of "Lady Audley." In the evening, the exciting drama of Janet Pride, in which all the members of the company appear to great advantage, will be performed.

On Monday, the American tragedian, Mr. Alexander Fitzgerald, will make his first appearance at this Theatre. Mr. Fitzgerald is reputed to be a talented and versatile actor; his reportory is extensive, embracing many leading characters of the standard and modern drama. He also enjoys considerable reputation as an Irish comedian. He will make his debut before a San Francisco audience in the fine play of Belphegor. The company at present engaged at the Metropolitan is undeniably a strong one, and will afford Mr. Fitzgerald efficient support.

The third of a series of three concerts will be given by the Madrigal Society of San Francisco, on Tuesday evening, August 20th, at Platt's Hall. The two former concerts were highly successful in a musical point of view. Many of the finest compositions of the old Madrigal writers being beautifully sung. On this occasion Mrs. Louisa Grotjan, Mrs. S, Leach, Mrs. Uhrig, Mrs Weston, Messrs. Herberte, Elliot, Pocock, Wunderlich and Leach, will appear, assisted by a select chorus of twenty-five voices. Mr. George Evans will preside at the piano. The programme, which is a very fair one, will be carried out under the direction of L. W. Leach.

I must acknowledge the receipt of an invitation to be present at the last of the series of the Occidental Theatricals, at the Turn Verin Hall. On Tuesday, August 20th, Hamlet will be performed. Mr. George M. Ciprico, the manager of the association, as the "Prince," Mr. Geo. Bonnell as "Leartes," Mr. S. S. Roberts as "Ghost," Mr. J. B. Badger as the "King," Mr. J. C. Jenkins as "Horatio," Miss Erances Simon as "Ophelia," Miss F. A. Pitts as the "Queen," and Miss Mary J. Bragg as the "Player Queen."

For many weeks past the ladies and gentlemen who are to take part in this representation have devoted themselves assiduously to study. High hopes are entertained that it will be produced in excellent style. The entertainments given by the Occidental Theatricals are always well attended by the fashion of the city.

Colonel Moustere's benefit, tendered him by the members of the Olympic Club, at their rooms on Sutter street, took place on Wendesday evening. The performance was in every way a most successful one; the most difficult and dangerous gymastic feats were performed with a degree of ease and grace which would have done credit to professional performers.

OLD STORIES RE-TOLD.

THE FRENCH IN IRELAND,

ON the morning of the 22d of August, 1798, the town of Killala, a seaport facing a large inlet of the Atlantic in the county of Mayo, was startled by the appearance in the bay of three frigates, showing English colors. The arrival of English cruisers seemed especially unaccountable, as the province (Connaught) was then quiet, although rebellion was raging in other parts of Ireland.

Mr. Kirkwood, a magistrate, who commanded the local yeomanry, though not much alarmed, kept his corps of thirty horsemen under arms at the castle, the residence of Dr. Stock, Bishop of Killala and so did Lieutenant Sills, of the Prince of Wales's Fencibles, his twenty militia-men from Ballina, a place seven miles and a half distant.

The next day was the visitation of the dioceses of Killala and Achonry (sees now abolished), and the sensible and good-natured bishop was entertaining three or four of the clergy and two officers of the carbineers, from Ballina, at the castle. The ladies of the family—the bishop's wife, his sister-in-law, Mrs. Cope, and eleven children—had just retired to the drawing room. The bishop and his friends had drawn closer round the claret; the pleasant after glow of a summer evening was gleaming on the ruby of the wine; the Atlantic decanting into the bay was crimson as a bowl of Burgundy; when suddenly the door flew open, and terrified messenger informed the bishop that the French had come, and that three hundred of them were within a mile of the town. General Humbert (Hoche's second in command at Bantry Bay in 1796) had, indeed, disembarked with one thousand and ninety men. The carbineer's officers instantly leaped on their horses and dashed off to carry the news to Ballina. Lieutenant Sills resolved to fight, and mustered his fifty yeomen and fencibles at the castle gate. The men then marched into the main street, which stands at right angles to the castle, and prepared to meet the French advance guard, which came on in a dark mass of blue and scarlet and sour sallow faces: the drums beating sharp, fierce and quick. In a moment two yeomen were struck dead, and the rest fled, leaving Captain Kirkwood alone to stand fifty shots before he was taken. Lieutenant Sills, retreating into the castle, was soon after obliged to surrender to General Humbert, who sent him away the next day to the ships to be taken to France, because he was an Englishman. Nineteen of the yeomen were also secured by the French, and closely imprisoned in the bishop's drawing-room. One of the bishop's guests, the Reverend Dr Thomas Ellison, of Castlebar, having formerly been an officer, could not resist the sound of the drum, and at the approach of the French shouldered a musket and joined the yeomen. He stood fire well, was wounded by a spent ball, and was one of the last to retreat into the castle. The worthy bishop retired into his garden to collect his mind while the firing went on, and succeeded in the attempt by the time the French general and staff of seventy officers arrived in the castle yard and demanded to see Monsieur l'Evêque.

The French soldiers were, except the grenadiers, generally short men; their clothes were shabby, their faces pale and sallow with the recent voyage and the fatigues of the campaigns of Italy and the Rhine. At the siege of Mentz, the winter before, many of them had suffered great privations It is only necessary to say they were French Solders, to be sure they were temperate, intelligent, self-reliant, patient and full of ardent courage. They had started eighteen days before from Rochelle, and tried unsuccessfully to land in Donegal, where a succeeding expedition afterwards failed to get footing.

General Humbert, who had distinguished himself in the desperate Vendean war, was sanguine of success. Ten more frigates and three thousand men would soon be off the coast. Ireland would be a free and happy nation, under the protection of France, within a month. A Directory was immediately to be set up in Connaught. The tricolour and the green flag would wave together, and scare the English lion. Humbert was an ignorant man of low origin, who had forced his way through the ranks by prompt decision and by physical energy. His passions were furious, his manner marked by a roughness and violence that was only assumed to carry out his own purposes. He was tall and well made, and in the vigor of life.

The bishop being a traveled man, spoke good French, and General Humbert told him to be under no apprehension. He and all his people would be treated with respectful attention. He even hoped a person of the ability and consequence of the bishop would serve himself, and help to liberate his country, by joining the new Directorate. The main army, under General Kilmaine, numbered ten thousand men, and three thousand more on board ship were ready at Brest, under General Hardy. Nothing but what was absolutely necessary for support was to be taken by the French troops. The evening was spent in giving hurried orders for the disembarkation of the men, and making arrangements for their quarters. The French officers boasted, after their manner, that they had brought arms for one hundred thousand men and nine pieces of cannon. They had really with them arms for only five thousand men and two four-pounders.

The bishop's dining-room, on the evening of the landing, half an hour before the scene of tranquil festivity, was soon turned into a noisy guard-room, crowded with gesticulating French soldiers dragging in leather valises and cases of ammunition, and with prisoners being examined by savage-looking republican officers, while in one corner a surly-looking grenadier captain was having a severe wound dressed by a surgeon and his assistant. Three hundred soldiers swore and chattered in the court-yard and offices. Immediately on entering the dining room, the bishop's butler was called for, ordered to collect all plate and secure it in his pantry. Not an article stolen, nor so much as a hat, whip, or great-coat pilfered from the hall. The yeomanry were locked in the drawing-room in the middle floor. Two bed-chambers adjoining were seized for the general and his principal officers. The attic story, a library, and three bed-rooms were reserved sacredly for the bishop and his family, and only on one occasion did the officers ever enter those rooms, and that occasion was the evening the tidings reached the French of their victory at Castlebar.

On the morning after his arrival, Humbert pushed forward to Ballina a detachment of a hundred men, forty of whom he mounted on the best horses he could find in the country. He concealed under the arch of a bridge near Killala a sergeant's guard, to watch the enemy's reconnoiterers. A shot from this ambuscade proved fatal to a brave young clergyman, the Reverand George Forteseue (nephew to Lord Clermont), who had put himself at the head of a party of observation from Ballina. That town at once fell into the hands of the French, the carbineers, the yeomanry—all but one fat, lazy fellow, who was caught in bed—taking to their heels with great unanimity. Humbert returned to Killala in triumph in poor Mr. Forteseue's two-horse curricle, with the fat yeoman (looking like a seal just awoke) by his side in full uniform. Several hundreds of rebel peasants, recruits, rent the air with their acclamations. A green flag, with the inscription "Erin go Bragh," was now mounted over the castle gate as a rallying standard for the pikemen, to whom arms, clothing, and ammunition were to be at once distributed. Ready money would arrive in the very first ships from France. In the mean time goods brought in voluntarly were to be paid for by drafts on the future Irish Directory. For the first three days the French commissary of stores spent his whole time in writing these valuable documents, but at last he began to treat the matter as a joke, and the people soon learned to consider it in that light also. Other promises were, however, more promptly fulfilled. Chests, each containing forty fusils, and boxes crammed with new French uniforms and gaudy helmets, were unlocked in the castle yard, and the contents given to the first applicants. About one thousand peasants were completely clothed; the next comers received everything but shoes and stockings; to the last arms only were given—in all, about five thousand five hundred stand, according to French reckoning. The muskets were well made, but the bore was too small for English bullets; the carbines were especially good; the swords and pistols were reserved for the rebel officers.

The country people pressed forward to snatch these fatal presents, forgetting that an English army of scarcely less than one hundred thousand men was already marching fast toward county Mayo. Many of the recruits were forced to join by the menaces of their friends and the dread of rumored Orangeman oppression. The bishop paints quite a Hogarthian picture of the vanity and ignorance of these raw, hot-blooded levies:

"The coxcombry of the young clowns in their new dress; the mixture of good humor and contempt in the countenances of the French, employed in making puppies of them; the haste of the undressed to be as fine as their neighbors, casting away their old clothes long before it came to their turn to receive the new; above all, the merry activity of a handsome young fellow, a marine officer, whose business it was to consummate the vanity of the recruits by decorating them with helmets beautifully edged with spotted brown paper to look like leopard's skin, a task which he performed standing on a powder barrel, and making the helmet fit any skull, even the largest, by thumping it down with his fists, careless whether it could ever be taken off again—these were circumstances that would have made you smile, though you had been just come from seeing your house in flames. A spectacle not less provoking to mirth presented itself to your view, if you followed the new soldiers after they had received their arms and cartridges, and observed their manner of using them. It was common with them to put in their cartridges at the wrong end; and when they stuck in the passage (as they often did), the inverted barrel was set to work against the ground till it was bent and useless. At first they were trusted with balls, as well as with powder. But this practice was not repeated, after it had gone near costing his life to General Humbert. As he was standing at an open window in the castle, the general heard a ball whistle by his ear, discharged by an awkward recruit in the yard below, whom he instantly punished with an unmerciful caning."

The French now required boats at once, to transport the artillery and stores from their ships, and carts and horses to bring them from the shore to the town. High prices were offered, but the fishermen and carmen did not respond to the call. The bishop was then arrested and marched half way to to the French ships, when the fishermen and boatmen, alarmed for their good bishop procured a supply of boats and carts.

Though the enemy was full of professions, and took nothing with them but what was absolutely necessary for the field, they nearly ruined the poor bishop. They burned thirty tons of his coal in one month, besides setting the kitchen chimney several times on fire with their ragouts. They drove away his nine horses, and six more belonging to his guests. They consumed his corn, potatoes, and cattle, before they touched those of any one else. They emptied his well-filled cellar and larder in three days. They carried off his cars, carts, and waggons, so that the worthy prelate computed his loss in thirty days only, at six hundred pounds.

Meanwhile, the enemy's main body, under Kilmaine, had landed, and had scarcely began their march, when a flag of truce arrived from Castlebar, carried by Captain Grey of the carbineers. He came, under pretence of inquiry for an officer wounded at Ballina, to discover the strength of the enemy. He privately told the bishop that a force three times Humbert's number waited at Castlebar to give a good account of the enemy.

Everywhere before the French advance fluttered the impudent proclamation of General Kilmaine. In this caricature of republican aggression he said that a band of heroes had came to liberate the Irish from the hands of tyrants, to teach them the arts of war, and to despise the "low pursuits of toil and industry," "We have made," said the gasconador, "all the nations we have conquered happy by arresting their property, by applying it to the common cause, and consecrating it to the champions of liberty. Property is a common right belonging to the valor that seizes it." (Could Canning have written a more bitter parody than this of intolerant and fanatical republicanism?) "We have always destroyed the unaspiring tranquillity of Switzerland, and the wealth, the power, and the bigotry of Italy are no more." The proclamation ended by imploring the Irish to cast off the bondage of religion, and to put down "that grand impostor, the Pope." The Irish were to "fly to the French standard, and enjoy at once the blessings of French fraternity."

The French entered Ballina with about nine hundred bayonets and two thousand pikes.

The omens that greeted them were not favorable. No disaffected Protestants joined the tri-color, no well-to do persons of any kind. On a tree, in a conspicuous place, hung a rebel agent, executed for having a French commission in his pocket. The French officers embraced the unconscious rascal, "bedewed the body with tears of sympathetic civism," exposed the corpse in the streets to excite the populace against the loyalists; and, after that, carried the dead body to the Roman Catholic chapel to lie in state surrounded by lighted candles, as that of a hero, a patriot, and a martyr.

In the mean time, Lake and Cornwallis were roused and in earnest. There were two roads (now disused) leading from Ballina to Castlebar. The lower road, by the east of Lough Conn, passes through Foxford and crosses the river Moy, a deep, wide river, by a long, narrow bridge. This road was guarded by General Taylor with the Kerry regiment, two battallion guns, some companies of the line, and some yeomanry cavalry. The upper road by the pass of Barnageeragh, running westward of Lough Conn, was considered impractible, and therefore left open. Humbert leaped at this chance; he pretended to go by Foxport, then dashed at the pass and all but surprised the unsuspecting English. An accident prevented the surprise. A small farmer, up at three to visit the cattle on his mountain-farm, observed a strong column of men dressed in dark blue winding toward the pass. He instantly galloped to Castlebar and woke up the garrison. General French road out toward the pass, but his escort being fired on by the French advance guard, he rode back to call out his forces and form them on a range of rocky heights north of the town, commanding a rising ground one thousand yards distant, which Humbert must of necessity cross. The blue and the scarlet were to meet again upon a new battle-field. It was too late now to occupy the pass that Humbert could never have forced if it had been held by only a single company. The pikemen were already hallooing and tossing their rude weapons, that thirsted for English blood; but Humbert did not believe in pikes against muskets.

The royalists were in two lines on the heights; first the Kilkenny militia, some of the 6th, and a party of the Prince of Wales' fencibles. In the second line were the Fraser fencibles and the Galway yeomanry. In a valley in the rear were four companies of the Longford militia in reserve. The cavalry, a part of the 6th Dragoon Guards and the 1st fencibles, were in the rear of the first line; the artillery were a little in advance, two curricle guns on the right of the road, and to the left two battalion guns of the Kilkenny militia.

At eight o'clock the tricolor showed, and the French drums beat aloud, as Humbert's men came on in a close driving column, covered by a clump of rebels roughly dressed in French uniform, sent forward with the agreeable object to themselves of drawing the first heat of the artillery fire. To the swarms of noisy pikemen in his rear, Humbert—already sick of his wild allies, and their superstition, treachery, greediness and cruelty—paid no attention whatever. But woe betide the Kilkenny and Longford men if they were once broken and the pikes came down among them.

The royalist guns were coolly and cleverly served. The first round shot from Captain Shotall's six-pounder plumped full into the head of the advancing French column and broke it into two parts. Humbert drew his column back and re-formed. Again the hydra head appeared over the bridge, and a second shot struck the column in the old wound. Fifty brave Frenchmen then ran forward and got under cover of a house, but the rest retired again to re-form.

Five minutes' lull and the indefatigable column again crossed the ridge, driving cattle before them to blunt the cannonade. This was an old, wild, Irish and buccaneer trick. But, again repulsed, Humbert at once changed his tactics, and deployed rapidly from his center with open files, nearly parallel to the English position. The skill and rapidity of these manœuvres of veteran troops staggered the mere militia regiments. They began firing uselessly at a harmless distance. The French, encouraged by this alarm, ran forward en tirailleur, seized some hedges, and extended with great rapidity to outflank the royalist line.

In war, the man first frightened is first beaten. The militia wavered along its whole length, then fell back, leaving the cannon unprotected. The regular troops fled pell-mell to the town. A few of the Longford men were rallied, and fired from stone wall to stone wall to check the advance of the enemy, and afterwards on the Bridge of Castlebar, to protect a curricle gun, there still steadily served by the artillerymen. This party of brave men suffered severely, for they were galled by a cross fire from two roads and from the houses on either side. The men often fell back and were rallied by their officers. At length, nearly all the artillerymen being shot, the gun became silent, and a body of French hussars dashed forward at the charge, but were repulsed. The staunch men retreated, having lost two officers and half their number.

The French were as brave, and still more daring. Ten of their hussars hung on the rear of the fugitives, and, capturing a gun, were about to turn it on the runaways, when a large number of Lord Roden's "fox-hunters" charged back, killed five, and drove off the rest. The place where these hussars were buried is still called French hill. The carbineers fled with such extravagant haste that they achieved the sixty-three miles between Castlebar and Athlone in twenty-seven hours. The Royalists lost fifty-three men, thirty-four were wounded, and two hundred and seventy-nine were taken prisoners. Fifty-three men of the Longford militia deserted to the enemy, and, reversing their coats, were marched into Killala amid the cheers of the delighted rebels.

A more disgraceful defeat than that of the Royalists at Castlebar not even Welcheren or Bergen-on-Zoom exhibited. The rebels stormed into the town, mad with delight: but, thanks to the French, they committed no cruelties, eager as they generally were for blood. Almost the only victim was a lion of a Highlander who would not leave his post at the door of the town jail. He shot down five Frenchmen; and, while he was loading for the sixth time, a grenadier, beating out his brains, flung him down the steps with the sentry-box upon him.

The garrison of Killala was now ordered to the front, and only three French officers, Charost, Boudet and Ponson, left to drill and keep in order two hundred armed rebels. These men did their best to protect the threatened Protestants, giving them arms, and keeping up a nightly patrol. The mutinous rebels becoming infuriated at the distribution of arms, they were given up to guards appointed for each district of the town and neighborhood.

General Humbert, writting to Charost, and ordering him either to bury the powder which had been left behind, or to throw it into the sea, ninety barrels were hidden under a hot-bed in the garden, and the rest placed in a vault in a haggard under the corn-stand. On three occasions fires broke out near the powder, and it was only by the great precautions of the excellent bishop that it was eventually saved.

The rebel officers were generally great scoundrels, and kept the people of Killala in perpetual alarm by their insolence and threats. One drunkon fellow named Bellew, brother of the Bishop of Killala, was quartered at the house of a merchant, from whom he extorted money and clothes, was in the habit of tearing down slips of the wall-paper to light his pipe, and was tyrannical and unbearable. Another of these swaggerers was named O'Donnel, a young farmer and custom-house officer, who vexed the bishop by his vulgar forwardness; but who always did his best to keep the peace and restrain the insurgents. This man was afterwards shot by the English when they retook Killala, and Bellew was hanged.

In the mean time, the French had already lost all hope, and were disgusted with their allies, whom they beat and neglected, everywhere taking to themselves the best food and the best quarters. None of the gentry had joined them except two of three lost men, sottish and reprobate. The French also especially offended the peasants by resolutely preventing as much as possible the robbery or persecutions of Protestants.

The game was now nearly played out. Humbert turned from Sligo. Marching by Drummahair towards Leitrim, the French general, nearly at his last move, left behind three guns, and threw five more into the river. He was now making for Longford, where the people had risen, but the staunchest of bull-dogs were close upon his heels. The French rear guard was incessantly pressed by General Lake's cavalry, behind whom were mounted the light infantry. Humbert, at bay, halted from time to time, and grappled with his leading assailants. Half a mile from Ballynamuck, Sarazin, the second in command, at last surrendered with all the rear guard.

The Earl of Roden and Colonel Crawford, then sounding a trumpet, rode up to the French advance guard, and desired them to surrender, to save any more effusion of blood. Humbert requiring half an hour to think over it, and still retreating, Lord Roden ordered the advance; the first and second French brigade then surrendered to about three hundred of our cavalry. Humbert rallied his grenadiers and chasseurs, and made prisoners Lord Roden and twenty of his dragoons, who were taking some guns. They were prisoners exactly fifteen minutes, and during all that time the French officers kept cursing the United Irishmen for having deceived and disappoint them. The fencibles advancing in angry search for their colonel, the seven hundred and forty-eight French and ninety-six officers surrendered, or they would have been instantly cut to pieces. The French, since their landing at Killala, had lost two hundred and eighty eight men.

The revenge taken on the wretched Irish rebels was savagely cruel and brutal. About five hundred were cut down, shot, or hanged during the pursuit round Ballynamuck. They were found by dozons in the fields, drunk or worn out with fatigue. Wherever they were met, the sabre fell upon them. At Carrick-on-Shannon seventeen rebels were hanged at one time at the door of the court-house, the prisoners being compelled to draw lots from the adjutant's hat—one hundred lots being drawn, with death written on seventeen of them.

On the 25th, the sound of cannon and the flame of blazing cabins announced the advance of the royalists upon Killala. The town became rapidly filled with frightened fugitives from Ballina. The rebels made a stand behind some stone walls on the high ground outside the town. Their fire was ineffective, and they were at once routed and pursued by the Roxbury cavalry. Four hundred of them were cut down in the streets, or mown down by the cannon on the sea-shore. Col. Charost narrowly escaped death from the gun of a maddened Highlander who wanted to give no quarter.

So ended an irrational and useless insurrection, with the usual horrible results of more bloodshed and less liberty. General Trench instantly pushed detachments into the wild districts of Laggan and Erris, where the rebels' cabins were burnt by dozens, For years after, however, the mountain borders of Sligo and Galway were infested by deserters and outlaws, who lived by cattle-stealing, and who houghed the cattle and burnt the corn-stacks of the enemies. Two of the most notorious of these robbers, Gibbons and M'Greal (Red James), were at last seized; the former was hanged and the latter pardoned

On the 27th of October, in this same year 1798, two French frigates again entered Killala Bay with two thousand men: intending to commence operations by burning the town and carrying the bishop off to France—as they said, for betraying them. Some English cruisers; however, appearing, the frigates stood out to sea, and came no more. They were already too late, for the Brest squadron had been struck to pieces after a long and gallant fight, on the 11th of October, off Tory Island, by Sir John Borlase Warren, and there were captured one seventy-four, three vessels of thirty-six guns, and two of forty; three others escaped. Wolf Tone, captured in one of the French vessels, was tried and condemned to death, but he killed himself in prison.

Popping the Question.—All ladies know—by instinct—how the question of questions should be asked—so asked as to make it tell. But very few young men know how to ask it gracefully. Love-stricken youths often act sorrily on occasions of this kind; in fact, like the merest lubbers; and the worst of it is that those of them who would make the best husbands often spoil their chances by floundering ridiculously at the critical moment. For this reason saucy, world-hardened fellows who never stammer, blush, or falter, not unfrequently carry off the prize from unsophisticated excellence— the lady not discovering until too late that she has mistaken brass for gold. Under these circumstances, why will not some gentle creature of a "certain age," who has nothing more to hope, or fear from man, undertake to teach the young idea how to shoot dexterously at the matrimonial target? It would be a profitable business, pecuniarly, beyond a doubt; and then as philanthropic. There are multitudes of young men who would give ten dollars apiece to be able to do the thing with éclat, and it certainly might be taught in less than "six easy lessons." The lady preceptress should make her pupils propose to her until perfect in the art of proposition.

Retribution to the Luxemburgers—How they Sold their King for Ten Francs.—A curious incident in the modern history of Luxemburg is related by the Kreuz-Zeitung and other German papers, with the remark that if the Luxemburgers are being sold by their sovereign, it is only an act of strict retribution, since the Luxemburgers had begun by selling their sovereign, and very cheaply, too. The affair is told as follows: Some thirty years ago the oldest church in the country stood in the capital of Luxemburg, on the present Wilhem's Place. Being in a ruinous state, it was taken down, and its religious relics deposited in the Liebfrauen Church, situated close by. The historical monuments of the old church were not treated with equal respect, but strange to say, came under the auctioneer's hammer, and were for the most part sold for a song. A lawyer bought the coffin and the corpse of John the Blind Count of Luxemburg and King of Bohemia. Seeing that he expended on this whim only the moderate sum of ten francs, he could hardly be accused of imprudence in thus appropriating to himself the dust of royalty. After having satisfied his curiousity on the subject, corpse and coffin had to wander into a corner of the garret of the house, till it was removed, with other articles of a legacy, to Prussian territory, and came into possession of a manufacturer on the Saar, where the remains of the chivalrous king were as disrespectfully stowed out of the way as before.

Years afterwards when King Frederic Wilhelm the Fourth of Prussia traveled through the Rhine Provences, he visited this factory, which had formerly been a fine abbey. The proprietor, in showing his royal guest over the place, said, jestingly, that "he was sheltering another king," and related to his majesty the singular adventures of the royal corpse. The anger of the king was only pacified when the proprietor respectfully placed at his disposal the mortal remains, affording thus an opportunity to atone for the heavy guilt of the Luxemburg country. If the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg had sold the sole and last remains of its old counts, and had not even six feet of Luxumberg ground to spare for them, the Prussian King gave them a royal grave, such as hardly may be equalled. An old chapel, called the Klause, most picturesquely situated on a high rock above the river Saar, was renovated at great expense and consecrated as a resting place for the remains of John the Blind. Let us hope that the spirit of the ill-treated King is above human frailty, and above planning revenge on the people who sold his ashes so cheap.

Parisian Demi-monde.—There are localities in Paris where, by passing through a series of velvet-covered doors, and paying a trifling admission fee, one can get a sight of the orgies of civilized barbarism, can revel in perpetual carnival, can see men and women gone astray from the real objects of life to make pleasure the only end of existence. The lively French term for these places is hardly translatable; the demi-monde, one says, that is, perhaps, the world of the disreputable caste; and yet the respectable penetrate there every day and evening in the year. These centres of dissipation are becoming as numerous as the sands of the sea-shore this year, and are never in want of patronage. New York has nothing like them; London does not know how to maintain them; Vienna and Berlin, and Florence and Naples but faintly echo them. In the most popular of these places, concert and ball alternate during the evenings of the week. The music is always enchanting, artistic; the balls are conducted with an abandon and absence of decorum which Rabelais would have blushed to recount. Women who lead lives luxuriously miserable one month, and who suffer in pitiful poverty the next, parade their toilets and their vices there; the young Parisian comes there to slap his boots and twist his cravat under his ear in the fantastic dances; and the strangers, fresh from the steamers, in soft hats and sack coats, hie there to see life. The expenses at these places are very light, and therein lies the special danger; one is tempted to become a habitue. All that art and nature can supply to decorate are called into requisition; Mabille and the Salle Valentino testify to this. They are just the thing which we do not want in America; and between them and the cafe concerts is a barrier of respectability which cocattes and grisettes cannot break down.

The man in the moon is making faces at us. For the first time a change has been noticed in the features of the old gentleman. It seems that at the last session of the Academy of Science, a paper was read on the subject of a recent change in the moon's surface. A crater, well defined and perfectly well known to astronomers, has disappeared within a year, and its place is marked by a large white spot in the middle of a plain.

Let us carry into the world neither curiosity nor indiscretion. Curiosity is the defect of a little mind, which, not knowing how to employ itself at home, feels the necessity of being amused with the occupation of others. In relation to minute objects it is ridiculous In important affairs it becomes odious.

An inviolable fidelity, good humor, and complacency of temper in a wife, outlive all the charms of a fine face, and makes the decay of it invisible.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

The Last Chronicle of Barset. By Anthony Trollope, Author of "The Claverings,' "Can You Forgive Her?" "The Small House at Allington," "Orley Farm," etc., etc. With illustrations by George H. Thomas. New York: Harper & Brothers Publishers, Franklin Square, 1867. San Francisco: H. H. Bancroft & Co.

In a more eminent degree than any other of the popular writers of English fiction, now living, Mr. Trollope possesses the art of investing an imaginary narrative with the air of a plain chronicle of facts. It may be said, indeed, we believe it has been said, that this atmosphere of realism, so perceptible in such stories as "Miss Mackenzie," the "Small House at Allington," "Barchester Towers," and nearly all of Mr. Trollope's novels is simply the result of their tameness of style, their poverty of incident, and the commonplace character of the persous introduced. Had he written nothing but such stories as the "Small House," and "Miss Mackenzie," with their most unheroic heroes, their drowsy dialoguc, and their sordid scenes and characters, all so marvellously true to the life as to produce the disagreeable effect of reality, this explanation might seem to bc sufficient. We might then say to ourselves, these stories seem wonderfully real, bccause they have no ideal quality, and evince no imagination. The characters are amazingly life-like, it is true; but they are also quite uninteresting and such as one might meet at an ordinary boarding house, and not feel particularly anxious to cultivate an intimacy with. They are drawn to the life—no doubt of that—but are they worth drawing at all? Thc skill exhibitcd in delineating Johnny Eames "the hobble-de-hoy," and Crosbie, in the "Small House," the pitiful hero of "Miss Mackeuzie"—we cannot recall his name, nor is it worth while to recall it—and in reflecting so faithfully the homely featnres of certain common phases of society, is undeniable, but is it the skill of art—or at any rate of any higher art than the Chinese faculty of literal imitation? But the insufficiency of this explanation is shown, iu part, by the fact that Mr. Trollope invariably manages to make his stories intensely interesting, and this he generally effects without the aid of a plot, a "mystery," or any sensational element whatever, Most persons of fair average culture experience more actual enjoyment in reading "Barchester Towers," or the "Small House," than in the different kind of fascination they find even in the better class of sensational novels, Mr. Wilkie Collius's for instance. It is further shown in this that, though Mr. Trollope's characters are always natural, they are often very far from being commonplace. Lady Mason, and the chivalrous old baronet in "Orley Farm," the author's nearest approach to the sensational style, are notable examples of this, and the Rev. Josiah Crawley, in the "Last Chroniele of Barset," is another, and a much more profoundly interesting one, drawn with an insight, which so far as this type of character is concerned, we had not given Mr. Trollope the credit of possessing. Thus, the realism of this writer is not of the blundering, unintelligent kind, and thongh from a critical point of view we may confound it with literal dullness, it does not produce the effect of dullness. Its precision is not so much Chinese as Flemish. It has touches like those of Hogarth. In short, Mr. Trollope's realism is like that of Balzac, a conscious and artistic realism, that aims intelligently at the prodnction of effects by using uuderstood means.

"The Chronicle of Barset," with which we are at present more particularly concerned, is thoroughly, aud in one sense, painfully pervaded by this realism. But the painful feelings excited in the reader's mind, are not of the natnre or quality that are repugnant to the spirit of art. There is a subtle intellectual pleasure mingled with them which jnstifies the delineation by which they are produced, and brings it within Wordsworth's æsthetic canon. The interest of the story commences with the first paragraph of the first chapter, and thenceforward seldom flags for a moment. The Rev. Josiah Crawley, an eccentric clergyman, very learned, miserably poor, inflexibly proud, and thoughly imbued with the belief that he has been hardly dealt with by the world, by his church, and by Providence itself, is the central figure of the book. Importuned and bullied by a butcher to whom he is indebted, he pays him a check of twenty pounds, which he is soon afterwards accused of having stoleu. Hc is qnite unable to account for the possession of the check, and gives in succession two different explanations of the manner in which he received it, both of which provc to be false. His wife, whose confidence iu him is unshaken, believes that his troubles have disturbed his intellect, and that he came into possesion of the paper when he was not himself and in a manner which he cannot now recall. On his preliminary examination he is committed for trial at the assizes, and bailed by a brother clergymau. And now, the only question discussed in the county is in regard to Mr. Crawley's guilt. The unfortunate man has never been a favorite with his bishop, the Dr. Proudic, of "Barchester Towers" who, as all the readers of that entertaining story will remember, was largely assisted iu administering the affairs of his dioeese by his wife. The "anti-bishop" faction which existed in the county, and looked up to Archdeacon Grantley, (also transplanted from "Barchester Towers") as its head, considering that the accused man is persecuted by the bishop, or rather by his wifc, whom they scandalously declare to be the true "power behind the throne" at the episcopal palace, take up his cause, more however, in a spirit of opposition to the bishop than from any conviction of Mr. Crawley's innocence. Mrs. Proudic, insists upon suspending the accused man from the discharge of his clerical functions until after his innocence shall havc been established by an acquittal. The bishop, knowing that he has not the power to take the step demanded by his wife, whom he is quite unable to convince that there are any limits to his episcopal authority, endeavors to preserve domestic peacc by a compromise. He accordingly dispatches a note to Crawley, "advising" him not to appear in the pulpit until his innocence shall have beeu vindicated. The latter, however, thoroughly understands his position, both with reference to the law, the community, and his ecclesiastical superior, and he peremptorily declines to act in a way inconsistent with the principle that a man is presumed to be innocent until proved to be guilty. Mrs. Proudie, indignant and outraged at the contumacy of the threadbare, and nearly starviug curate, gives her lord no respite until he cousents most reluctantly, to adopt more vigorous measures. One of the bishop's chaplains is accordingly sent on the next Sunday to officiate in Mr. Crawley's pulpit; but his mission proves an utter failure, the rebellious clergyman, sternly insisting upon discharging his official duty as usual. The messenger, quite nnequal to a contest with his resolute and indomitable opponent, contents himself with entering a weak protest by attending the service, wearing his snrplice, and occupying a conspicuous pew, in testimony of his readiness to discharge the duty which he was prevented from assuming by superior force. This new defeat, of course, produces a scenc at the episcopal palace. Mrs. Proudie becomes almost frantic, and the unhappy Bishop, as a last resource, writes to Mr. Crawley, reqnestiug an interview with him at the Palace. He is not without hope that the poverty-stricken curate may be so impressed by the state and splendor of the scene into which he will be introduced, that he may become more tractable. But he is very far from knowing his man. Josiah Crawley instead of being dismayed, is immensely exhilarated at the prospect ot an encounter with the weak bishop, who neither understands the limits of his own authority, nor the rights of his clergy. His spirit kindles within him in anticipation of the battle, and, in obedience to the summons, he walks fifteen miles, the distance between his residence and the Cathedral town, purposely choosing his way through the muddiest places, in order that he may have the satisfaction of parading his wretched poverty before the eyes of his bishop, and of treading the episcopal carpets in patched and dirty boots. The interview that succeeds, at which Mrs. Proudie is present, not by any means in the capacity of a silent spectator, and in which she experiences a terrible overthrow, is onc of the best scenes of the kind ever described by any novelist, and is entirely satisfactory.

The other chief characters of the book, are Lillie Dale, whose acquaintance we first made in "The Small House," her "hobble de-hoy lover, Johnny Eames, who has now emerged from his hobble-de-hoy-hood aud developed into quite a man of the world, who can talk small talk to ladies without blushiug, and go through a fashionable dinner and the common rontine of society without embarrassment. Lillie's mother and nncle, together with Crosbie, her recreant lover, and other subordinate characters belonging to the "Small House" or to "Barchester Towers," reappear in the present work, where we have no doubt that all the readers of those charming stories will be glad to renew an acquaintance with them.

Stories and Sketches by Our Best Authors. Boston: Lee & Shepard, 1867. San Francisco: A. Roman & Co.

The title of this volume is not only attractive intrinsically, but is especially calculated to excite the interest and curiosity of those who would like to learn, who, in these days of multitudinous authorship, are entitled to the high distinction of being classed with "our best authors." In turning over the pages of the book, we experienced a not altogether unnatural sense of disappointment, upon finding nothing from the pens of Donald G. Mitchell, William Henry Curtis, Mrs. Stowe, Harriet Prescott, Mr. Trowbridge, Bayard Taylor, or indeed from any of those whom we have been accustomed to regard as "our best writers." But we are growing old, and a new generation of writers is springing up around us, with whose name and fame we are probably not as familiar as we should be. Indeed we are constrained to the frank confession, humiliating as it is in the editors of a literary journal to make it, that the majority of these gentlemen, vouched for by Messrs. Lee & Shepard, as "our best authors" are quite unknown to us either by reputation, or through their prodnctions. With the exceptions of Mr. Fitz Hugh Ludlow and Mr. Charles Dawson Shanly, to neither of whom we should personally feel inclined to assign a classic position in our literature, there are but few of the writers whose names we are familiar with. To most of the stories we find such names attached as "Richard Wolcott," "Mrs. Galpin," "J. L. Lord," names which, so far as they revive any distinct associations in our memory, are more suggestive of the Philadelphia ladies' magazines, or of Beadle's Monthly, than of the Atlantic or the Galaxy. But though the title of the book is unquestionably a misnomer, and "our best writers" have contributed very little to its contents, there are, nevertheless, a number of clever stories in the collection, and we are not quite sure that as a whole it will not prove more attractive and agreeable for reading at the seaside, or the places of summer resort, than a volume of equal bulk made up of the productions of authors of wider reputation. It often happens that ladies and gentlemen who have not greatly distinguished themselves in literature, achieve an exceptionally brilliant performance, while others of established fame, do not always maintain their level. A volume of tales might easily be compiled from the magazine contributions of comparatively obscure writers, which as a whole would be more interesting than an equal number of the average pieces of our very best authors who have attempted this kind of composition. Without being prepared to affirm that we have discovered anything in the present volume so remarkably good as to drive us to adopt the hypothesis that like poor Fitz James O'Brien's "Diamond Lens," it is the author's ultima thule of achievement, which he is destined never to surpass or equal, we may say that taken as a whole it contains a great deal of just that kind of reading that one finds pleasant in the cars, or on the steamer, or indeed under any circumstances which are unfriendly to conscious mental exertion, or to long-continued attention to the same subject.

POKER AND JOURNALISM.

THE question, whether the proprietors of one of the leading journals of this State are addicted to "draw poker," must be regarded as one of the political events of the day, since Mr. Gorham's Placerville speech, in which the charge was made, followed by a formal denial in the editorial columns of the Sacramento Union. Should this important issue be decided adversely to the proprietors of the Union, it maybe some consolation to them to know that they are not the first distinguished journalists who have rested under a similar imputation. The New York Citizen states that Ben Wood, the projector of the Evening News, which now claims a circulation of one hundred thousand, recently met with a catastrophe at "draw poker," resulting in pecuniary damage to the extent of $45,000—the winner being "a prominent and respected member" of the Common Council. A still further source of comfortable reflection for the Sacramento gentlemen, may perhaps be found in the circumstance that while the proprietor of the News is said to have lost a small fortune at a single sitting, they, according to the statement of the Republican candidate for the gubernatorial chair, invariably got the better of the "clerks," whom they condescended to honor by admitting them into their "little game." As the minutest details of historical events possess a certain interest, we will add that according to the Citizen, Mr. Wood lost on a hand of three queens against three aces, and that the encounter took place near the Fifth Avenue Hotel, in the same room, and at the same table where the same distinguished politician and journalist had before won $128,000 from Congressman John Morissey in a single evening.

ECCLESIASTICAL CLOTHES.

THE question of costume, diplomatic and ecclesiastical, seems to be attracting an unusual share of attention on both sides of the Atlantic. Gen. Banks, not long ago, introduced it into Congress with reference to the style of coat that it is seemly for an American diplomatist to wear at European courts; the Earl of Shaftesbury brought it up in the House of Lords, with a view to prescribe the ecclesiastical garments to be worn by Anglican clergymen, and, more recently, it has been fiercely agitated among Episcopalians at the East, where twenty-eight bishops of that denomination have issued a "Declaration" against the use of certain ritualistic practices and "vestments," employed in some of the churches in the diocese of New York. A large number of publications has been issued on both sides of the controversy, here and in England, and the battle still rages with great violence, very strong feeling and equal resolution being manifested by either party. Upon the return to San Francisco, of the Rev. J. Dillon Eagan, who will arrive, it is said, in the next steamer, some similar questions are expected to arise here, in which contingency the Spirit of the Times and the Morning Call will probably once more volunteer their valuable services to aid the ecclesiastical authorities in arriving at a sound decision, in accordance with the laws and traditions of the Church.

HISTORY OF PELEG COWCOPPER'S VOYAGE AND EXPERIENCE IN CALIFORNIA.

BY DOGBERRY.

CHAPTER I.—THE VOYAGE—THE GULF STREAM.

I LEFT my native land on the first day of January, 1850, in a good ship commanded by Captain Codfish. There were on board seventy-nine souls, forming a joint stock company for the purpose of mining, trading with the Indians, making our fortunes and getting back home as soon as possible.

On the second day out we experienced a most terrible storm in the Gulf. Captain Codfish said he had crossed the Atlantic one hundred and twenty-four times and he never saw such a a storm before.

The Gulf Stream is a most singular phenomenon. No one has as yet fairly accounted for its existence. My theory is this: the action of the moon when it is full, operates on the aqueous globules of water at the equator. Now, water, as everybody knows, is formed of two gasses. The molecular action of these gasses generates heat. When, then, the earth turns around, as it generally does once every twenty-four hours, the pressure of the vast bodies of ice at the two poles forces the water toward the Equator, and then as it must run somewhere, it runs up the coast of South America; but as water cannot always run up it runs into the Gulf of Mexico and then out again, when, having acquired new force, it runs up again, up the coast of North America until it reaches Cape Hatteras, which projecting itself into the ocean, causes it to infringe over on the Cape Verd, the home of the dusky negro, who in time past has been so cruelly dealt with, torn from his native land and forced to labor in foreign parts for the benefit of hard-hearted masters. Such are the wrongs for many years sanctioned by the Democratic party, but the spirit of progress which animates this age, at length has torn the fetters from the limbs of the slave or any other part where they happened to be, and made of him, thanks to the Emancipation Proclamation and the heroic efforts of our brave soldiers, headed by such men as Grant and Sherman and many others, bright on the roll of fame, a free man.

This is my theory of the cause of this oceanic current. I have got it as far as Cape Verd and there it may stay.

CHAPTER II.

LIFE AT SEA—ADVENTURE IN RIO DE JANERIO.

Life at sea is very monotonous, except in a storm, or when one is sea-sick, or drunk. We saw flying fish and some albatross. We also saw a school of whales. Whales go in schools in order to furnish scholars with the midnight oil. The flying fish does not roost on a perch because there are no perches in the ocean. We crossed the equator. This is an imaginary line (except on the maps) running round the earth. We also sailed round Cape Horn. Some travelers assert they have doubled Cape Horn, but we went in full sight of it, and there was but one Cape. Of course there we encountered a tremenduous storm, which Captain Codfish pronounced the severest he had ever experienced, and he had been round the Horn one hundred and twenty-four times. Our spanker boom got foul of the bowsprit, which resulted in setting the ship so far aback that we never recovered the ground, or rather water, we had lost, for three whole days. Besides this we sprung aleak just abaft the rudder.

We put in, before getting to Cape Horn, to Rio Janerio. There we found nine hundred other vessels bound for California. While our company were rambling about the city, we caught sight of the Emperor. Determined to let him know that we were citizens of the great and glorious republic whose flag was never yet furled in dishonor before a foreign foe, we drew up in a row as he passed, gave three cheers and sang the "Star Spangled Banner." For this we were arrested and taken to the calaboose. There we passed the night in killing fleas, and reviling monarchial institutions. Why will a deluded people suffer themselves to be governed by a monarch, or a king, when they can so much better govern themselves, or be governed by a certain few of their fellow-citizens, who, owing to their superior skill in manipulating the machinery of government, are able to get themselves elected to govern the people.

In the morning we sent a message to the American consul, telling him to set to work and have us liberated, or there would be war. What possessed this functionary, I do not know. He acted very strangely, sending us a note intimating that he would take all proper measures for our relief, but also insinuating that we ought to behave decently, soberly and peaceably while in a foreign country. (We had the biggest kind of a row with the guard before they subdued us.) I would like to know the benefit of being an American citizen unless one can do as one pleases on a foreign shore? Was it for this that our forefathers fought and bled in the Revolution, that their sons cannot go abroad and feel perfectly at home, no matter who is around? Did it hurt the Emperor of Brazil for us to cheer our native land, and sing the national anthem? Were the President of the United States riding down Broadway in a barouche, hay cart, or any other vehicle, could not an Englishman, in perfect safety, sing "Rule Britania," "God save the Queen," or any other woman, and call for three cheers for his sovereign, without being torn to pieces by an enraged and patriotic populace? Isn't our glorious land the freest, our rivers the longest, our women the prettiest, our men the bravest, our trees the tallest, and our homemade whisky the strongest of any on the face of the globe?

CHAPTER III.

LIFE IN THE MINES—THE PATENT INTEGRAL CUNEIFORM GOLD SEPARATOR.

Our voyage to San Francisco occupied nine months. We got short of provisions, water, and awfully tired of each other. All of us kept diaries for the first two months, but none of them survived the fifth.

Owing to a defect in Capt. Codfish's chronometer we sailed five hundred and sixty-two miles too far to the north of the Bay of San Francisco, and then our dead reckoning having given out we went four hundred and seventy-two miles too far to the southward. Captain Codfish said he had crossed the equator one hundred and twenty-four times and never got quite so far out of the way before.

Our company went directly to the Southern mines. We embarked for Stockton in a schooner. From the latter place we resolved to foot it to the diggings, only hiring a team to transport our safe, weighing two tons, and our Integral Cuneiform Gold Separator, weighing five tons. This machine was for the purpose of separating the gold from the dirt. It was manufactured by a Connecticut man, who had gained quite a reputation by the construction of a new rat trap.

Each one of us carried two pair of blankets, a rifle, two revolvers, a pick and shovel, a pair of flat irons, a small bag of shot, a clock and umbrella, and a knapsack containing provision and many useful articles, such as books, bottles of whisky, hair oil, yeast powder, etc. We walked twenty miles the first day, and the next morning twenty of our company concluded to return home, being discouraged by reports from those on their way back from the mines.

At French Camp we concluded to leave our safe. Up to that point its freightage had cost us four thousand dollars. Smith, an influential man in our company agreed that at this rate before we got fairly into the diggings, its transportation would cost more than the derned thing ever would hold. So there we left it and never sent for it. The transportation of the Patent Integral Cuneiform Gold Separator to the banks of the Tuolumne where it was finally deposited, amounted to nine thousand dollars. It exhausted the resources of the whole company, obliging us to travel after it seventeen days on foot, living on pork and crackers.

Four of us commenced digging our first hole on the Tuolumne. Two of this number were soon severely injured and laid up for some time owing to prods in the back from picks in the hands of their comrades. It was then judged expedient to reduce the number in the hole to two. There seemed to be no gold in this hole, so after digging for three days we gave it up. Some miserable wretches came along a little after, went down nine inches further and took out twenty-five thousand dollars.

Fifteen of our company then gave up the mines and went back, saying the stories about gold were all humbug.

We started another hole and got a prospect. Then we commenced working our dirt in the Patent Integral Cuneiform Gold Separator. It required thirteen men to work the machine properly. The principle on which the Eastern inventor had constructed the confounded thing was that of a sausage mill. You were to put the dirt in at the hopper at the top, turn a crank and the gold was to squirt from the discharge pipe in one continuous yellow stream into the proper receptacle, while the dirt and stones flew out at another. On the first day we managed to grind through about three buckets of gravel and panned out two cents. It took five men to work the crank, two to pour in water, one to tend the governor which regulated something or other, two to keep the machine steady, one to hold the vessel in which the gold ought to have squirted more than it did, one to write East every day to the inventor regarding the successful working of the concern, and one to superintend the whole.

On the second day after working five hours and getting two buckets through, the crank broke, and as the machine stood on a bank about ten feet above the Tuolumne, the five men pitched over into river and with some difficulty escaped with their lives.

It was impossible to move the Patent Integral Gold Separator so we were obliged to prospect and mine in its immediate neighborhood.

CHAPTER IV.

WANDERINGS AFTER NEW DIGGINGS.

Our company finally broke up and dispersed, being unable to support any longer the weight of the Patent Integral Cuneiform Gold Separater which, including transportation, had cost us altogether fifteen thousand dollars, and yielded about four cents.

I went to Bungeye Flat. In "'50," Bungeye was a lively place. There were then over five hundred miners there, one hundred and two saloons, and five women, two of them being negresses. Shooting was to be had regularly every night, and every other prospect hole had a dead man in it.

I heard, however, of big diggings at Oak Flat, and went there, but there was no water. Bigger diggings were reported in Mariposa. I went there. There was no water. It was reported they were making over a hundred dollars a day somewhere on the Merced. I started for that locality, but as I was not able to find it, I could not get there. Meeting a man in a starving condition, with whom I divided my last dollar, he told me of a great excitement over in Calaveras; hundred dollar diggings again. I went there. No water, but reports of the biggest kind of diggings again at a place called Bull Bar, on the Tuolumne. I rushed for Bull Bar. The nearer I got to it the less did I hear of any great diggings, and when finally I did get to it, found it within a quarter of a mile of the infernal Patent Integral Cuneiform Gold Separator. I suppose it was the discovery of this thing of ours which caused the report of such heavy diggings,

CHAPTER V.

DEATH IN CALIFORNIA.

It is hard work to mine when one gets no pay. I had rather tend hogs. So I did tend hogs for a person at Rat Flat. The company wasn't quite so congenial but the pay was better,

I saw a great many men killed in California. One night at Cracksnout Bar a row occurred between Strabismus eyed Jim and Three-toed Bill in a dispute over a monte game. Drawing their revolvers, they commenced firing into the crowd and the result was that seven corpses of prominent and respectable citizens, who were also engaged in similar games, were laid out for inspection on the plaza the next morning, and thirteen were more or less injured, some of them fatally. The gamblers themselves, the shooters I mean, escaped without a scratch, and, when the dead men were buried, Strabismus-eyed Jim read over their graves the burial service in a most impressive manner. It was "quite a day" at Cracksnout Bar. Business was entirely suspended, the flags were at half-mast, and minute-guns were fired from two anvils. Everybody got more or less drunk, and about midnight there was another general row, and a great cracking of pistols, for everybody felt like killing somebody else, it didn't matter who so long as he was killed.

I have forgotten how many were shot that night, but they didn't have so much of a time made at their funeral, as the people by this time had got rather tired of such ceremonies.

One night I was sleeping in a cloth shanty near a gambling house, when a bullet, discharged by a desperado named Tiger Bill, ripped open the front of my shirt, passed through the house, killed a donkey in a shed near by, and finally buried itself in a Bible which "Scotty," a South Carolina sport, always carried in his carpet-bag.

After this I got tired of staying in California, making no money, and forever afraid of being shot, so I went home as I came out, "round the Horn." Off Cape Horn we encountered a tremenduous storm which the captain said was the most severe he had ever experienced.

CHARLES HENRY WEBB, the founder of THE CALIFORNIAN, is now employing his pen on "Miles O'Reily's" paper, the New York Citizen, from which we republish in our present issue a characteristic sketch by "John Paul," entitled "Economy and Suicide." Most of Mr. Webb's "literary recreations," however whimsical and effervescent they may seem at first blush, have an ulterior meaning, or a critical purpose; the present sketch boasts even of a "moral," and rather a striking one, to wit: that true economy consists rather in earning shillings, than in saving sixpences.

THE New York Weekly Review alluding to the forthcoming volume of poems by Mr. Charles Warren Stoddard, of this city, declares its intention to "improve an early opportunity to review the book," and adds: "In Mr. Stoddard and in Mr. Frank Bret Harte, California has two writers of whom she ought to be proud;" a proposition which will be very generally and cordially endorsed in literary circles.

THE COMMERCIAL HERALD AND MARKET REVIEW.—One of the very best commercial papers published in the United States is the San Francisco Commercial Herald and Market Review, published by John H. Carmany & Co., and edited by H. Channing Beals. It appears every steamer-day, and contains a clear and concise resume of all commercial transactions, printed in beautiful type, on fine paper. The commercial articles written by Mr. Beals for the leading dailies, for years past, have always been accepted by the business community as thoroughly reliable.

THE religious world will look forward with much interest to the result of the council of bishops soon to be convened at Rome. It in some degree resembles the council of Nice. Then the Christain faith was declared to be the official religion of the empire. The spirit of this age calls rather for the entire separation of church and state.

THE USUAL acknowledgements of the receipt of new books, together with a large portion of Literary Gleanings and several book-notices, are deferred until next week from lack of space in our present issue.

CAPRICE.

SHE hung the cage at the window;
"If he goes by," she said,
"He will hear my robin singing;
And when he lifts his head,
I shall be sitting here to sew,
And he will bow to me, I know."

The robin sang a love-sweet song,
The young man raised his head:
The maiden turned away and blushed:
"I am a fool," she said,
And went on embroidering silk
A pink-eyed rabbit, white as milk.

The young man loitered slowly
By the house three times that day;
She took her bird from the window;
"He need not look this way."
She sat at her piano long,
And sighed and played a death sad song.

But when the day was done, she said,
"I wish that he would come!
Remember, Mary, if he calls
To-night—I'm not at home."
So when he rang, she went—the elf!
She went and let him in herself.

They sang full long together,
Their song love-sweet, death-sad;
The robin woke from his slumber,
And rang out clear and glad.
"Now go!" she coolly said, "'tis late;"
And followed him to latch the gate.

He took the rosebud from her,
While, "You shall not!" she said;
He closed her hand within his own,
And while her tongue forbade,
Her will was darkened in eclipse
Of binding love upon his lips.

THE OVERTASKED BOY—A RESTAURANT STORY.

THE boy was never strong enough for the place. His age must have been about fourteen when he went there. He was inclined to be spiderish about the legs, and wandering in his mind.

His parent (a mother, his father being dead) had asked him several times what he would like to be? She might also have asked him what he would like to do and to suffer? What could he say? They were poor, and he could not be apprenticed to any trade; and yet it was necessary that he should go to work. He made several inquiries about employment, without success, and in an evil moment he saw a bill stuck up in a restaurant window "Wanted, a boy for the kitchen." He did not quite like the job, but he thought he would try. He was always a willing boy.

They engaged him upon trial at a few dollars a week, much to the delight of himself and his mother.

He began work on a Monday at six in the morning; his duty being to assist in preparing the kitchen for the business of the day. It was a busy place, that restaurant—a rushing, tumbling, bawling, maddening, busy place—between the hours of twelve and one. Every man in the city, seemed to run in there for luncheon, and to have no time to eat in. Digestion, and the nourishment of the human body, were seemingly considered to be things of very minor importance by the side of other appointments, transactions, operations, and the saving of a few minutes of time. The marvel is, why they came in at all—why they did not hurry along the streets, cramming pieces of bread into their mouths by the way, and washing them down by drinking from a flask constructed like a pocket-book. But no, they wanted something, and they rushed into the restaurant to get it, When there, their individual tastes were as various as the cut of their coats, or the patterns of their waistcoats. If they had all been content to feed out of a huge bowl, and drink out of a huge mug, the kitchen of that restaurant—notwithstanding its large fire in the heat of summer—would have been more like Paradise, instead of its antipodes. But the variety of food and drink, which they call for, and which was supplied to them with electric rapidity, was something wonderful: while their combinations of eatables were remarkable for ingenuity, and originality.

The boy's employment at this period of the day was to attend to the sliding shelves which descended from the restaurant to the kitchen, filled with empty plates, and which ascended from the kitchen to the restaurant re-filled with the various eatables. He had another, and a more onerous duty to perform; his ear was made the responsible repository of the crowd of motley orders which raced with fearful rapidity down a speaking tube. There was no time for thought, no time for repose. The powerful lungs of the master of the establishment were incessantly in action, giving out the mandates for endless food, in a bullying tone, that he imagined to be absolutely necessary to command attention. He was a bully by nature, this restaurant-keeper, Stout, beetle-browed, and perspiring. Paid his way, and did not care for baker or butcher. Why should he care for cooks, scullions, and boys?

At twelve o'clock mid-day this stern, determined man took up his position ready for anything. Orders were shouted down the tube to be in readiness. He felt like a General directing an army. At the turn of the hour, the avalanche of hunger came down upon the devoted building. Clerks, merchants, brokers—no matter what their relative stations—small balance at bankers, large balance, or no balance—met in the temple of refreshment as on common ground, for the general craving for nourishment had made equals of them all. It is a warm day, and the occasion of the opening of a new Exchange. Woe upon the luckless boy in the kitchen below. The tempest began with a beef-steak, plum pudding, clam-pie, roast-veal and French beans. Large plate of lamb and new potatoes; small plate and old potatoes; large plate again, and no potatoes—cauliflower instead. Extra beans for roast-beef, peach dump's. Now, the steam is up, and cooks, scullions, and boy are in fearful agitation, like the cranks and wheels of a large engine, working to the top of their bent. Stern, perspiring, excited proprietor bawls down the pipe, and demands that his words shall be repeated, to make sure that the order is clearly understood.

"Doughnuts!"

A feeble echo of doughnuts comes from the depths of the kitchen up the tube. Again the boy repeats the word to the man presiding over the gridiron: a glowing, dancing being, who, with a long toasting-fork, keeps pricking, goading, and turning small steaks, lamb chops, mutton chops, kidneys, and sausages—about sixty in number, all frizzling together over the same fire. An incessant rumble is caused by the sliding shelves going up and down.

"Roast veal and ham; gooseberry pie; small plate of cold beef and horseradish; chicken roast; large plate of boiled mutton, no caper sauce; rhubarb pie; extra cauliflower; large plate of roast beef, well done; small plate of roast mutton, underdone, greens, and new potatoes; small plate of veal, no ham; currant and raspberry tart; two steaks; puddings; lamb chop and cauliflower; extra potatoes, new; mutton chop; large steak and greens; small plate of roast fowl; basin of oxtail; extra greens; two sausages; slice of boiled mutton and new; kidney; rhubarb pies; now then, that roast fowl; small steak instead of oxtail; boiled mutton, lean; extra greens; summer cabbage instead of cauliflower with that lamb chop."

One after the other, these orders pour down the pipe, coming up executed in half dozens on the shelves. Perfect Babel and pantomimic madness below—fully equalled by the Babel and pantomimic madness above. The storm increases; the call for food becomes louder; the varieties are not distinctly marked. Names of meat and vegetables, fish, flesh, and fowl, pastry and salad, are mixed up together in hopeless confusion. The machinery is going wrong. Once the shelves come up with nothing on them, to be hurled down indignantly by stern proprietor. Again they rise to the surface with everything out of order—potatoes standing in the midst of raspberry tart, and gooseberry pudding put in a butter-boat. A waiter is ordered to take charge of the position, while the bursting proprietor rushes round to the kitchen to see what is the matter. Once more the shelves go down; once more they come up, containing a scrubbing-brush a bar of soap and one pickled onion! The storm of indignation from hungry customers is overwhelming. Again the stentorian landlord nearly splits the pipe with reiterated orders, sent down in a whirlwind of rage. A sound of a riot and imbecile singing is hear below.

The proprietor goes down. He finds the kitchen a wreck The dancing maniac boy at the gridiron; the cook and two scullions fled.

The boy has given way under the pressure; his mind is a blank; he resumes his post, but "his reason is dethroned!"

City men are eccentric, and very exacting where labor is concerned; but they are kind, humane, and generous, notwithstanding. They felt that they were responsible for this sad state of things underground. A subscription was raised. The boy wanted repose. He was removed to a lonely ranche on the Sacramento, far from the sound of everything, except the sailor's song upon the river, and the washing of the water in amongst the tules on the bank. His mind sometimes wanders, and his tongue babbles of strange and unknown dishes; but he is progressing favorably.—Pickles.

How to Avoid Wrinkles.—The penchant of the fair sex for good living has something in it of instinct. A series of exact and rigorous observations has demonstrated that a succulent diet, delicate, and well attended to, repulses for a long time and very far, the exterior appearance of old age. It gives more brilliancy to the eyes, to the skin more freshness, to the muscle more support; and as it is certain in physiology that wrinkles—those formidable enemies of beauty—are due to the depression of the muscles, it is equally true to say, all things equal, that those who know how to eat are comparatively ten years younger than those to whom this science is a stranger. Painters and sculptors are well aware of this fact, for they never represent those who are abstinent from choice or duty, as misers and anchorites, without giving the paleness of sickness, the leanness of misery, and the wrinkles of decrepitude.

THE DEATH OF EACH DAY.

NIGHT is the death of each day, the sleep of planet earth, and how very near those brighter worlds do come! Through forest leaves we see the clinging stars, as if Hesperian fruits were ripening. Venus at anchor is just beyond our hail, and Mars makes signals from his decks of red.

It is a solemn thing to sleep, whether beneath the watching stars or at high noon. Whither shall we pass into that noiseless going, and when shall we return? From world to world is but a breath of sleep, they say—then give us pleasing dreams.

Strangest of all journeys is that of "going to sleep." The fitful pulse grows softer; the hands forgets its cunning; the daughters of music are brought low; they that look out at the windows are darkened; care's raveled sleeve is knitted up—it is almost a dying. Happy is he for whom no Glamis hath murdered sleep; whose eyelids' noiseless close is like the drop of leaflets laden down with dew; whose slumbers deep as that which fell on Eden's gardener; and whose dreams as fair as Eve, the firstborn daughter of a mortal sleep.

Ah! that "how long shall we sleep?" has been the question of all times and tongues since the morning stars were singing.

"If a man die, shall he live again?" And once a year have the daisies answered it, and spring's little infant gives its fragrant testimony; and every day has the morning testified, and yet the world is murmurming still: "If a man die, shall he live again?"

"How long shall we sleep?" asks he who has cradled a living thought upon his breast, the child of his brain and his heart, as he sends it forth orphaned in the halls of Time, turns his face to the wall and dies! "How long shall we sleep?" sighs the poet, as he lays down the harp of life, feels the daisies growing over him, and goes away, where they sing the "new song forever."

Not long, true thinker, not long sweet singer; for the thought shall rise as a giant, and break the bands of sleep and thou in it; for the song shall fly like a bird from spring to spring again, and the music and the welcome shall be thine!

And when life's reign is over and gone, and the brow of the cloud is bound with a ribbon that hope did weave in the loom of God, and the tears on the world are turned to pearls in the sunset, what words more beautiful than these can we write upon the new graves: "He giveth his beloved sleep!"

How Snails are Eaten.—A writer, who has been among them, says that the Burgundians are fond of their great big vine-snails; but their principal merit is, that they are good, strong, nourishing food. The way that snails are generally served in good houses is this: Seven or eight of them are brought on a little hot silver plate, with a tiny silver two-pronged fork made on purpose. The seven snails are by no means unpleasant to look at, their shells being beautifully white and clean. The entrance to every shell is stopped with a sort of paste pleasant to the taste. You insert the fork and pull out the inhabitant. He is a huge animal and of a dark brown color, graduating to black. The black is the best. The beast is not pleasant to look at; so you should transfer him rapidly from his shell to your mouth, and when there you find him very like an enormormous morsel of tough beefsteak. Masticate him if you can! If you are successful, and go boldly on till you have emptied the seventh shell, you must be a hungry man indeed if you have not sufficiently dined; and this not because you are made sick, but really because these big snails are strong meat.

What Jennie June says.—Mrs. J. C. Croly, (Jennie June) testifies:

Q.—Do you, or not, prefer the Grover & Baker Machine for family sewing, and if so, why? State the reason fully.

A.—I prefer it to any machine. I like the Grover & Baker Machine in the first place, because if I had any other I should still want a Grover & Baker; and, having a Grover & Baker, it answers the purpose of all the rest. It does a greater variety of work, and it is easier to learn than any other. I like the stitch because of its beauty and strength, and because, although it can be taken out, it don't rip, not even by cutting every other stitch.

Q.—Among your acquaintances state whether this machine and its work is preferred to other machines?

A.—Yes, it is, especially within the last two years. I know three other ladies who have sold off other machines—sold at reduced prices—in order to get Grover & Baker, but recently, and they are very enthusiastic about their new machines.

[From testimony taken before the U. S. Commissioner of Patents, on the application for the extention of the patent for the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine.]

Kindness.—The humble current of little kindness, which, though but a creeping streamlet, yet incessantly flows, although it glides in silent secrecy within the domestic walls and private walks of private life, and makes neither appearance nor noise in the world, proves in the end a more copious tribute into the store of human comfort than any sudden and transient flood of detached bounty.

Education In France.—Some curious facts relative to the state of education in France have been revealed by the reports of the committee appointed to inquire into the condition of French agriculture with special reference to the proposed military reorganization bill. It appears from these reports that in 1848 the proportion of men liable to military service who could neither read nor write was 38.12 per cent.; in 1863, 38.61, and in 1866, 24.32 per cent. The proportion of uneducated women is of course much greater; in 1866' 42.02 per cent. The amount of education varies very much in different depratments. In that of Vosges 1.76 per cent. of the able-bodied male population only are able to read or write, while in Haute-Vienne it is 45.49 per cent. The number of villiage schools is increasing. hnt 694 out of the 37,648 communes are still without schools. In 1865 there were 440,000 children hetween the ages of seven and thirteen who bad never heen to school, and of those who had 49.8 per cent. only went to school, all the year round. The Government has devoted particnlar attention to the evening schools for adnlts, of which there hut 5,623 in January, while their numher has now increased to 28,546. These schools were attended last year by 552,939 men and 42,567 women. Of these 62,212 learned to read 192,132 to read and write, 194,102 became tolerably proficient in arithmetic, 56,059 in geometry, 33,282 in book-keeping and commercial accounts, 22,340 in drawing, 13,960 in singing and 8,386 in natural philosophy.

The Bones of Bull Run. A correspondent of tbe Cincinnati Commercial, writing of a visit to the battle-field of Bull Run, says:

"The first sight that greeted my eyes at Manassas Junction, was a forcible reminder of the war. Two hugh piles of bones; horse bones, cattle bones, and, sad to say, human bones intermingled, lay whitening right in front of the hotel. They are picked up off the battle-field by the owners of the soil, and carted here for shipment by the cars to be ground into fertilizers, at some mill in Baltimore. The price here is "a penny a pound," one of Fairbanks's platform scales standing ready by the railway track to weigh the deliveries, and several tons of bones have heen shipped. One man with a girl to help him, collected in two days, bones enough to come to $16. My landlord, a Pensylvania Dutchman named Verner, brought out a long and powerful looking hone from behind the bar, saying: "Here now is some poor fellew's thigh bone." The sight was not one to inspire cheerful reflections. In another great heap were piled masses of camp kettles, broken musket barreles, wheel-tires solid shot, and broken shells, fragments of swords, hits of wagon gear, old rusty fire-locks and the like. This, too, is for the market, the last relics of the huge debris of destruction of which every battle is the fruitful parent.

Some people keep their sterling worth in all changes of fortune; others, if changed in condition, lose their character. Bars of gold are less prized than diamonds, hut gold reduced to dust is valuahle, while diamond dust is worthless.

To Epicures.—There is considerable difference hetween a gourmand and a gourmet. In the gourmand the animal nature predominates, while the gourmet cultivates the sense of taste until it is rendered susceptible of receiving the highest gratification. The gourmand is satisfied to swill flat beer or sour wine, to eat ill-cooked viands, provided he can get enough to gorge himself withal. Epicures, or gourmets, who can appreciate the delicate bouquet of a fine wine as they delight in the perfume of the violet, should pay a visit to the store of F. C. Belden, No. 612 Sacramento street, where they will find the rarest brands of wines, spirits and liqueurs, the choicest teas and an immense assortment of delicacies, such as truffles, pate de fois gras, Stilton cheese, caviare, etc.

Wagon Manufactory,—C. Roberts' Wagon Manufactory is located on Fourth street, hetween Folsom and Howard. Grocers and milkmen would do well to leave their orders with Mr. Roberts, who is a thorough workman. Horse shoeing is another feature of this establishment. Mr. R. has had many years' experience in this branch of his business, and treats horses with tender feet in an improved manner.

GRAND TRIAL
....OF....
SEWING MACHINES.

CONTEST BETWEEN THE
FLORENCE AND WILLCOX & GIBBS.

THE
WILLCOX & GIBBS
TRIUMPHANT:

At the Great UNION FAIR, held at Island Park, between Albany and Troy, in September, two Premiums were offered on Sewing Machines. one for the BEST and the other for the "Second Best"—competition being open to the State.

On the first day of the Fair, the Troy Agent of Florence Sewing Machine Company, having, jointly with the Albany Agent of the same Machine, entered it for competition, published in the Troy Daily Times a challenge to Agents of other Sewing Machines, to meet them at said Fair and compete with them for the Premium.

The challenge was accepted by the Troy and Albany Agents of the Willcox and Gibbs Machine.

Each party was to prepare and subject to the judges a "list" of the several "points of merit" on account of which "superiority" was claimed. These "points" were to be separately considered, thoroughly investigated and practically tested, by work done then and there, upon each of the machines; and then decided in favor of the machine which was adjudged to excel on that "point."

Finally it was agreed that the machine which, at the conclusion of the trial, should be found to have the greatest number of those "points" decided in its favor should be decided the "BEST SEWING MACHINE," and awarded the FIRST PREMIUM.

The result of the trial was, that the

WILLCOX & GIBBS WON THE VICTORY

and the prize, by the extraordinary superiority of thirty-five points, decided in its favor, against two points in favor of the Florence.

Full notes were taken of the trial.

It is a fact worthy of remark, that during the entire trial—which continued without intermission for nearly seven hours—not a stitch was missed, nor the thread once broken, nor a needle broken or bent, by the Willcox and Gibbs machine. No kind of work was attempted to be done on it that was not accomplished, and done in a perfect and workmanlike manner; and no effort was made on it that was not entirely successful; while neither of these statements can be truly made in favor of the Florence.

This remarkable trial can not fail, through the facts developed by it, to be productive of important results. It has raised the veil and exposed to public view the true character of the opposition, who will no longer be able to deceive the public by misrepresenting the character and merits of the Willcox and Gibbs machine.

It is an improvement on double thread machines; and its "stitch," which was severely tested by the Judges, was decided to be much stronger and less liable to rip in use or wear than the "Lock Stitch."

It is the simplest in construction—does the greatest variety of work—makes no noise—is not liable to get out of order—costs the least money, and gives the best satisfaction.

☞ Full reports of this trial sent free to any address.

AYER'S AGUE CURE,

FOR THE SPEEDY CURE OF

Intermittent Fever, or Fever and Ague, Remittent Fever, Dumb Ague, Periodical Headache, or Bilious Fevers, indeed for the whole Class of Diseases originating in Biliary Derangement, Caused by the Malaria of Miasmatic Countries.

No one remedy is longer called for by the necessities of the American people than a sure and safe cure for Fever and Ague. Such we are now enabled to offer, with a perfect certainty that it will eradicate the disease, and with assurance founded on proof, that no harm can arise from its use in any quantity.

That which protects from or prevents this disorder must be of immense service in the communities where it prevails. Prevention is better than cure, for the patient escapes the risk which he must run in violent attacks of this baleful distemper. This "Cure" expels the miasmic poison of Fever and Ague from the system, and prevents the development of the disease, if taken on the first approach of the premonitary symptoms. It is not only the best remedy ever yet discovered for this class of complaints, but also the cheapest. The large quantity we supply for a dollar brings it within reach of every body, and in the bilious districts, where Fever and Agun prevails, everybody should have it and use it freely both for cure and prevention. A great superiority of this remedy over any other ever discovered for the speedy and certain cure of Intermittents is, that it contains in Quinine or mineral, consequently it produces no quinism or other injurious effects whatever upon the constitution. Those cured by it are left as healthy as if they had never had the disease.

Fever and Agne is not alone the consequence of the miasmatic poison. A great variety of disorders arise from its irritation, among which are Neuralgia, Rheumatism, Gout, Headache, Blindness, Toothache, Earache, Catarrh, Asthma, Palpitation, Painful Affection of the Spleen, Hysterics, Pain in the Bowels, Colic, Paralysis, and Derangement of the Stomach, all of which, when originating in this cause, put on the intermittent type, or become periodical. This "Cure" expels the poison from the blood, and consequently cures them all alike.

Prepared by DR. J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, and sold by all Druggists, everywhere.

NEW REMEDIES! NEW REMEDIES!

Dr. Gibbon's Dispensary.

ESTABLISHED IN 1854,
616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco.

For the treatment of Sexual and Seminal Diseases, such as gonorrhœa, gleet, stricture, syphilis in all its forms, seminal weakness, impotency, &c. Skin Diseases, (of years' standing,) and Ulcerated legs, successfully treated.

HORRIBLE DISEASES.

How many thousands of persons both male and female are there who are suffering out a miserable existence from the effects of secret indulgence, or from virus absorbed into the system. Look at their pallid, emaciated and disfigured faces, and their broken constitutions, disqualifying them for the happiness of marriage or the enjoyment of life. In this horrid situation thousands suffer until death closes the scene. Let parents, guardians and friends, attend to those who are suffering with any of these horrible, life-destroying maladies—see that they are cared for and cured before it be too late. Send them to Dr. Gibbon, a physician who has made private diseases his especial study for years, and who is certain to cure the most invetcrate cases without mercury or any injurious drugs. It is important to those who are afflicted, to be careful of the many pretended Doctors who infest all cities, publishing their skill in curing all diseases in a few days, imposing upon the public by using the names of eminent physicians from Europe and other places. Be therefore careful and make strict inquiry, or you may fall into the hands of these charlatans.

Syphilis is syphilis the world over; so is small pox, consumption, and other diseases, to the contrary of what quacks may say.

SEMINAL WEAKNESS.

Seminal weakness the consequent of self abuse. This solitary vice, or depraved sexual indulgence, is practiced by the youth of both sexes to an almost unlimited extent, producing with unnering certainty the following train of morbid symptoms, unless combatted by scientific medical measure; sallow countenances, dark spots under the eyes, pain in the head, ringing in the ears, noise like the rustling of leaves and rattling of chariots, uneasiness about the loins, weakness of the limbs, confused vision, blunt intellect, loss of confidence, diffidence in approaching strangers, a dislike to form new acquaintances, a disposition to shun society, loss of memory, hectic flushes, pimples and various eruptions about the face, furred tongue, fetid breath, coughs, consumption, night sweats, monomania, and frequent insanity. If relief be not obtained, should apply immediately, either in person or by letter, and have a cure effected by his new and scientific mode of treating this complaint, which never fails of effecting a quick and radical cure. Dr. G. will give $100 to any person who will prove satisfactorily to him that he was cured by either of the San Francisco quacks.

Dr. Gibbon is responsible, and will give each patient a written instrument binding himself to effect a radical and permanent cure or make no charge.

Persons at a distance may be cured at home by addressing a letter to Dr. Gibbon, stating case, symptoms, length of time the disease has continued, and have medicine promptly forwarded, free from damage and curiosity, to any part of the country, with full and plain directions for use, for ten dollars, sent in a registered letter, or through Wells, Fargo & Co.

Address DR. J. F. GIBBON, 616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco, Postoffice Box 252.

CAUTION TO THE UNFORTUNATE.

Beware of the San Francisco quacks and pretenders who with bogus sworn-to certificates, dupe the unwary. Some of the self styled doctors whose names are to be found in all the daily and weekly papers of San Francisco and other places, are tradesmen, and become too lazy to work at their trade. Some are tinsmiths, shoemakers, newspaper carriers, intelligence offices keepers, etc. Look over the San Francisco City Directory and you will find their former occupation in it. Look at the Directory for 1862-63. The only way to avoid imposition is make inquiry—it will cost you nothing and may save you many regrets, for advertising physicians in eight cases out of ten are bogus, there is no safety in trusting any of them till you know who and what they are. Dr. Gibbon does not deceive people by exhibiting bogus titles, certificates, pretended patients' letters, etc. Dr. Gibbon will satisfy persons who may call at his office of his ability to treat diseases that he proposes to cure.

☞ Persons writing to Dr. Gibbon will Please state the name of the paper they see his advertisement in.

BABBITTONIAN,

OR SELF-TEACHING

PENMANSHIP

The System of Babbitonian Penmanship is pre-eminently self-instructing. With its ample explanations of right and wrong forms—its sixty wood cuts—its plain intelligent rules, one may sit down by his own fireside and become a finer Penman than he could at much greater cost in the usual way with a living teacher.

There is a great demand for fine Penmen in the commercial world, and this system, at a trifling expense, imparts a skilful command of the Pen, worth hundreds of dollars to the fortunate possessor.

Penmanship is an indispensable accomplishment to Ladies, and this system is elaborate in a series of elegant copies in the Ladies' Style.

Business men have sometimes lost thousands of dollars from ignorance in regard to Business forms, and there is furnished in a set, without additional charge, a fine variety of Business Forms and Abbreviations. To sum up the Excellencies of this System, it is—

1—Scientific in its Arrangement of Principles;
2—Artistic in its Movements and Flourishes;
3—Practical in its Combinations and Applications;
4—Stylish in its neat and chaste Gracefulness;
5—Superior for Legibility, Rapidity and Beauty;
6—Most Disciplinary for fingers, Arms and Muscles.
7—Unexcelled for Comprehensiveness and Simplicity.
8—Complete and Self-Teaching for Private Learners;
9—Time, Labor and Expense Saving for Pupils and Teachers.

The Babbitonian Penmanship

Is published on durable card-board slips, ninety-two copies illustrated, put in a neat package with a Chart, the whole complete at the low price of $1 50.

Babbittonian Pens.

One reason why the country is flooded with poor Pens is that they are generally made by mechanics, rather than by artistic and experienced Penmen, the only partics really understanding the requirements of a good article.

The Babbittonian Pens,

Made in the most finished style, by skilful artisans, after models prepared according to the combined wisdom and experience of several amateurs and old Professors of Penmanship, are admirably adapted to meet the public wants.

The Babbittonian Ladies' Pen,

Is one of the most exquisite little instruments for delicate writing ever constructed.

The Babbittonian Extra Fine Pen,

Is pronounced by a large number of Penmen to be more free, more durable, and more varied in capacity for either fine or coarse strokes than any foreign Pen whatever. Suitable for elegant writing, it is a great favorite with the ladies and gentlemen.

The Babbittonian Business Pen,

Having great freedom and variety of movement, is unequaled for general business or school purposes. Somewhat coarser than the Extra Fine, it wears longer and moves more easily on paper.

☞ This Pen is now in use in the large counting-houses and banks in this city.

A RARE GEM OF ART.

"The Lord's Prayer,"

A pen drawing, by Mr. D. F. Brown, is one of the most remarkable works of art ever exhibited in this country. By patient labor he has succeeded in producing a design which for skill and beauty of execution, exquisite softness and delicacy of finish, and general merit, it would seem scarcely possible to surpass. The central figure—the face of our savior—is one of marvelous power and beauty. This and the faces of the Twelve Apostles, forming the border of the piece, are faithful copies from Leonardo da Vinci's famous painting of the

LAST SUPPER,

Reproducing, with the softest and most perfect shadings, the conceptions and characteristic expressions of the originals. Within this enclosure the words of the Lord's Prayer, in ornamental letters of various original designs and exquisite finish, are an interesting study of art in themselves; while appropriately distributed among these, miniture groups and scenes of marked events of Savior's life, copied from the great masters—five of them from Raphel's celebrated designs—form a harmonious completion of this unique, beautiful and truly wonderful work. The faces of

OUR LORD AND HIS APOSTLES.

Alone, so finely copied, would be a treasure in any house, and worth the full price of subscription.

IN THE PROBATE COURT of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

In the matter of the Guardianship of the person and estate of WILLIAM CHARLES HOLLINSEAD, Minor.

On reading and filing the petition of Jeremiah V. Hollinsead, Guardian of the person and Estate of William Charles Hollinsead, Minor, praying for an order of sale of the real estate therein described, and it appearing to this Court that said lot constitutes the entire estate of the said Minor, and that there is no personal estate, or money with which to provide for the maintenance and education of the said Minor, or to pay taxes and street assessments levied upon said real estate hereafter, and that it is for the best interest of the estate of the said Minor, that the said real estate should be sold.

It is ordered, That the next of kin of the said Minor, and all persons interested in the said estate appear before this Court, at the Court room thereof, at the City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, on Monday, the 16th day of September, A. D., 1867, to show cause, if any they have, why an order should not be granted to said Jeremiah V. And it is further ordered, that a copy of the foregoing order be published once a week for four weeks, in the CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper published in the city and county aforesaid. M. C. BLAKE, Probate Judge.

Paris Exposition, - - 1867.

ADVICES JUST RECEIVED BY MAIL ENABLE US to announce positively that the only gold medal for American Sewing Machines was awarded to Elias Howe, Jr., as the manufacturer of the best Sewing Machine that was exhibited There were eighty-two different Machines in competition for the prize, and Mr. Howe received the additional award of the Cross of the Legion of Honor, as manufacturer and inventor. The exact wording of the award is as follows:

HOWE MACHINE.	WHEELER & WILSON.
"Co operateur Elias Howe, Jr., promoteur de la Machine a coudre, Medaille d'or."	"Wheeler & Wilson, pour la machine a boutonniere, Medaille d'or."
TRANSLATION.	TRANSLATION.
Co-operator Elias Howe, Jr., improvement on Sewing Machines, Gold Medal.	Wheeler & Wilson, for Buttonhole Machine, Gold Medal.

The official list of those who were made Knights of the Legion of Honor, as published in the Paris papers, reads thus: "Mons. Elias Howe, Jr., fabricant de machines a coudre exposant." Which, translated into English, reads: "Elias Howe, Jr., maker of Sewing Machines, exhibiting."

From this it will be seen that the medal awarded to Wheeler & Wilson was for a "Buttonhole Machine," AND NOT FOR THE SEWING MACHINE.

H. A. DEMING, Agent,
No. 137 Kearny street, near Sutter.

An American Knight of the Legion of Honor—Among the many who have been the recipients of medals and honors at the Exhibition at Paris, none stand so high on the list as the celebrated inventor and manufacturer of Sewing Machines, Elias Howe, Jr. The Emperor, who shows great tact and discrimination in these matters, has made Mr. Howe a Knight of the Legion of Honor, and the jury on Sewing Machines, who had the task of testing and awarding prizes for excellence, unanimously decided that Mr. Howe was not only entitled to great honors as the inventor of the Sewing Machines, but that he carried off the palm as a manufacturer as well, and to him was awarded accordingly the first of the only two gold medals assigned this class. The numbers who have called upon Mr. Howe, at his office, No. 64 Regent street, to offer their congratulations, prove that many besides the Emperor and the jury acknowledge the justice of the claim.—The Courier, London, England.

FITCH'S STATION.—Going on board the Alameda boat last Sunday morning, at nine o'clock, we found the usual crowd of Sabbath-breakers bound for their Sunday airing across the Bay. There were men and women dressed in their Sunday clothes: uncomfortable objects to look at because such people are so apt to carry on their faces that expression arising from the fear of soiling their broadcloth and fine inou. There were little children dowdily and negligently attired, and little children dressed with a fanciful degree of precision and nicety. There were Germans who take to recreatinn on the Sabbath as naturally as a young duck wanders from its first habitation, the fragile egg-shell, into its native element. There were men with guns and dogs, intent on the murder of the feathered and gizzard creation foolish enough to take up temporary quarters in Alamedn county. There are clerks, freed from the thraldom of the desk and the counter. On nearing the Alameda wharf, all this mass clustered about the gangway and eagerly awaited for the putting ont of the plank. All of us wished to save time and step on shore from two to ten seconds before the rest. This is natural. It is human. It tends to create a great calm of the mentality to get on shore a second or two before our brother. And then we scrambled into the cars as though that locomotive was intent on leaving each particular one of us behind. This is also natural and human. And then we sat and stared at each other, and waited for the train to start. The grand hustle, hurry and confusion of landing was over. There was nothing to do save to sit and think, and thinking is not so agreeable an employment to all of us as——well, as trying to get ahead of each other.

Fitch's Station, where we disembarked, consists at present of a simple platform situated between Alameda and San Leandro. Some day a large town may settle down there—indeed, for the sake of some kind people living near, we hope it will soon settle, and, after settling, stay. At present, it is chiefly inhabited by mosquitoes, who, in one case, failed not to give a stranger a bloody reception. There was also a cow tethered in our path. We went round that cow. Her horns were sharp, and she shook them. Pride dictated that it would be more valiant that the cow should go round us, but prudence said it was only a cow after all, and it were better to humor her and allow her to keep the road if she wanted it. If it had only been a bull though—some of the spirit which animated our various fathers in '76, would have resulted in great bravery or a clean pair of heels. Some day we will go on with a further account of this trip to Fitch's Station.

CONDITION OF THE INTERIOR CLERGY.—We learn from the Copperopolis Courier that a clergyman was run away with by his team, and thrown out near Knight's Ferry, getting seriously injured. This is a sad commentary on the manner in which the people in that part of the country provide for their ministers. The clergyman referred to, was probably hauling wood. They allow them to do such things in order to eke out their scanty salaries. They allow them to kill hogs, herd battle, tend quartz mills, mine, and dry up in procuring a subsistence for themselves and families on arid ranches. The condition of Protestant divines in that region is terrible. We have lived among them, and have witnessed it with our own eyes. That population like well enough to have preaching, but how they do hate to pay for it. And the poor minister gets poorer and poorer, and as he gets poorer he keeps moving with his family farther and farther south until he arrives at a locality a few miles below Snelling, Merced county, known as Forlorn Hope. We visited Forlorn Hope some three years since, and found five of these suffering divines living and preaching within an area of ten square miles. Think of that, ye metropolitan clergy! Why, the sufferings and trials of the interior clergy are not half known. When they move from Forlorn Hope they travel still further south into Tulare, and then no one ever knows what becomes of them.

OUR PETROLEUM STOVE.—We have bought a petroleum stove. It is an epitome of the utilitarianism of the age. There is no coal to black one's fingers, no kindlings to cut, no neighbor's gates or fences to steal to furnish kindlings, no ashes to be carried out and thrown away and fly back in one's eyes, realizing the idea of dust returning to dust, no stovepipes to clean and get angry while cleaning. It is almost a reasoning, conscientious cooking animal. The man who brought it showed us how to work it. You pour the petroleum in a reservoir at the top of a long iron pole. Then you squirt some petroleum into a hole at the bottom and light it. Then there are four wheels which regulate things. After lighting the fire at the bottom you wait five minutes and touch her off somewhere else. Then you turn one of the wheels (we've forgotten which,) to regulate the supply. N. B. We've breakfasted at a restaurant ever since the thing came. The cooking apparatus is ingenious and complicated. The man who brought the stove showed us how everything worked, but we forgot all as soon as he left, and have been obliged to hire him two hours every day as a petroleum stove teacher. Besides, we have two hours drill in lighting the fire and getting the run of the strange and diabolical apparatus. We expect to be able to cook sometime next month. The run of conversation during drill is something as follows: A proceeds to turn a wheel.

B.—"Say, that ain't the right one; its the other."

A.—"That's the one he turned."

C goes to work on his own responsibility at another part of the machine.

"A.—Here C, let that screw be. This is the one."

C says nothing, and stolidly proceeds to light the fire. It puffs like an explosion of gunpowder. All rush to the other end of the apartment.

A and B.—"Look here, C, you'll have us all blown up if you ain't more careful."

C.—"That's the way Mrs. Scroggins lit her machine."

B.—"Yes, but this is another kind. This is the Angel Gabriel patent."

The fire burns with a blue and red flame. A, B and C gradually draw near, when it gives another snort. They run back again and tumble over each other. The petroleum stove laughs in its sleeve.

YOUTH AND PIE.—Our family being broken up and scattered in various portions of the country, and nought being left us save our two boys, we tried restaurant life for a while, being their first experience at these public mangers. To the youthful mind the bill of fare is attractive, but most tantalizing. The human stomach, even in a growing boy, has capacity for only a few dishes at a time. What to choose is the puzzle. The first morning, some fifteen minutes were occupied in looking at the catalogue. Samuel finally selected mince pie and tea. William wanted squash pie and coffee. Rather a queer choice for breakfast, but there is a sort of embargo laid on pie at home; so we allowed them full range for a time in the kingdom of piedom. At dinner, another onslaught on pie was contemplated. This, unwillingly, we checked. We are fearful of bad results. We had charge of the health of these two rulers of the Republic. Could we be a passive murderer of a future Congressman, or mayhap President of these United States with pies? Not by any means. So we mildly recommended a change to more solid diet, which was adopted with the happiest results, and the health of the future Congressmen was preserved.

WHAT IS HAPPINESS?—Such is the question asked by a contemporary. Happiness comes to humanity in fragments. A company of Diggers surfeiting on horseflesh are supposed to be happy. So will Gorham be for a time when certain of his election. So will be the man who wins a new hat—by the same. For other examples of fragmentary happiness may be mentioned, a woman with a new sewing machine, Keeler reading notices of his lecture in the dailies, a dying editor, a third-rate actor or actress at sight of a favorable line from a confused critic, an entomologist on finding a new bug, a talker when he can talk, and a bore with carte blanche to bore a sailor on his first night ashore certain of ten hours' consecutive sleep and soft tack for breakfast, Gorham abusing the Bulletin, the Bulletin abusing Gorham, and Major Stratman pounding loyalty into pugilistic people. These are a few thin slices of human happiness.

HOW MANY TICKETS?—"How many tickets are there in the field?" asked a friend of us not long since. He imagined we could tell. There are, said we, authoritatively, three State tickets, viz: Democratic, National Republican, and Gorhamite Union. Four Legislative tickets, viz: Democratic, National Republican, Independent Union, and Gorhamite Union. Five City tickets, viz: Democratic, People's—here the complication, commences to stagger us. Democratic, National Republican, Gorhamite Independent, Independent—Democratic—no—let's commence again: Democratic, Democratic Gorhamite, Independent Haight, National Gorhamite Independent People's, People's Democratic, then there's the Pixley-Cox ticket, the Axtell-Sam Platt, the—O, come to-morrow!

THE SOCIAL EVIL.—Laura Cuppy handled this delicate subject in a most delicate manner, on Sunday evening last at her church. She deems that "fallen women" should have equal social privileges with "fallen men." Should fallen women be compelled to slink into a back seat at the theatre, while equally fallen men sit in the dress circle and fan the delicate daughters of the land? Man is allowed to fall whenever he sees fit, and society is always ready to lift him up again; but when woman slips down the steep and slippery declivility, there is no scrambling up again for her. She talks awfully, dreadfully, and severely, about our weak and unfortunate sex.

DETENTION OF WITNESSES.—There is certainly no great inducement to witness scenes of murder in this city, or at least to testify to such, after witnessing them. Manuel Josephs killed a man on the 21st of March last. He has been tried and sentenced to seven years' imprisonment. Two laboring men witnessed the deed. Being too poor to give bail, they have been in confinement about five months, and on being released are allowed $100 each as compensation for their detention. The law is a fearful and mysterious monster.

OUR BOYS IN BLUE.—Much complaint is being made this week regarding the conduct of the soldiers from the Presidio. The most commonly noted offence is that of forays on Pacific street dens, involving a large consumption of liquor without paying therefor. In this regard these sons of Mars do themselves more injury than anyone else. Pacific street whisky is not sanitary. Let them drink it up, all of it if possible. It will tend to make the "boys in blue" bluer still.

ONE DRUNK.—The local column of the Oakland News, five times out of six, contains an account of the arrest, trial, sentence and confinement of one solitary drunkard. We believe Oakland maintains a perpetual drunkard just to give an air of liveliness to the city, and more especially to the News. San Francisco counts her drunks by the dozen, daily. Why cannot Oakland have one?

THE FLAG AND THE SKIES.—Said Axtell, in his speech, on Thursday night, "He was proud to see the flag cheered when it appeared in the Hall. It is the banner of the eagle and loves the sky."

Yes, and some people say that some of Axtell's present supporters had no objections, a few years since, to have blown that "starry flag" sky high.

GRANT DOGGED.—General Grant is said to be dogged by a detective, a shadow furnished him by his warm friend Butler. Nearly all American travelers have brought home their little batch of stories concerning the spies and informers peculiar to European Monarchies. We have not to go so far to witness such "doings" now.

GLUMFUNGUS.—The leading spirit of the Flag exhibits great talent in the invention of sounds, to designate his adversaries. He alluded recently to Mr. Conness as the Great Glumfungus. There is genius and inspiration in this rumbling combination of syllables.

Speech-making.

The Gold hill News referring to the fact that two Ohio members of Congress once purchased the same speech from a Bohemian, who made it his business to sell brains to Congressmen whom nature had not literally supplied with that commodity says:

"We have the proof from a late territorial Judge and others of some such "impostures" in behalf of Pacific coast delegates at Washington. Speeches and lectures written by Bohemians, and paid for with gold watches, have been delivered by Pacific coast Congressional bore-constructionists, at the Federal Capitol and in San Francisco."

Well, what of it? Considering the number of bad speeches which are made by uneducated men, we think that those "written by Bohemians" ought to be welcomed. A stupid man has a perfect right to employ a man of talent and education to put his few ideas into decent language and supply more. It is too bad of the News to attempt to spoil business just about election time. Such speeches are not impostures. The man who buys a good speech shows respect for his audience. We don't object to gold watches, and think that some of the candidates for position would act wisely in sending round a few and getting some really first class speeches written. Confound the Gold Hill News! "Impostures" forsooth! We are in the speech-making business. "Speeches for sale ready made, or made to order! Speeches of all sizes constantly on hand! Speeches of a hundred different shades of opinion! Old speeches cleaned, altered, and repaired." There, if the Gold Hill News doesn't like that style of card we can't help it. We are on it.

That Strong Boy Again.

About once a month an advertisement appears in a daily paper setting forth the fact that "a strong boy is wanted in a candy store." This horrible advertisement appeared once more on Tuesday. Thus it ran:

WANTED—A strong boy 17 to 20 years old, to learn the Candy Manufacturing Business.

A terrible suspicion haunts our mind. Is it possible that a boy a month is used up in that candy store? Where are all those other strong boys? Does a strong boy die from the effects of an over consumption of candy in the short space of four weeks? Alas! Perhaps those other boys were young little boys who speedily lost their strength. Perhaps they were nice little strong boys of about nine or ten years of age, healthy little boys at first, but who at length undermined their constitutions by eating peppermint lozenges, and committed suicide with burnt almonds. Now, this candy-man wants an old boy, a strong boy, a boy of from 17 to 20 years of age. How long will that boy of 20 years of age last. Not long. In four short weeks that candy man will once more advertise "Wanted, a strong boy!"

THE CONSUMPTIVE.

IN vain the morn unbends her brows;
A shadow all the sunshine shrouds;
The moon at evening vainly ploughs
Her golden furrows in the clouds.

In vain that moon her splendor hath—
The stars in vain their gracious cheer;
There moves a phantom on my path—
A shapeless phantom, that I fear.

The summer wears a weary smile;
A weary hum the woodland fills;
The dusty road looks tired the while—
It climbs along the steepy hills.

Still do I strive to build my song
Against this grim, aggressive gloom;
O hope! I say, be strong, be strong!
Some special saving grace must come.

I sit and talk of sunnier skies,
Of flowers with healing in their gleams;
But still the shapeless shadow flies
Before me to the land of dreams.

"O friends of mine! why sit dismayed
And watch," I cry, with bated breath?
Yet from their answering shrink, afraid
Lest that they name the name of DEATH.

A MIDNIGHT ADVENTURE.

"GOING up to-night, Frank?"

How quick a man discovers the friendly outlines of a familiar face, even amidst the confusion and tumult of a crowded railway depot! I had fancied myself unrecognised, as I leaned against the arched brick doorway nearly shrouded in shadow, watching the hurried, anxious faces that came and went, under the flickering gas-lights: yet here was Carew's hand on my shoulder, and Carew's genial countenance looking into mine. We had been close friends and allies two years ago, when he had been conductor, and I was engineer on the same train. Tempted by a more liberal offer, I had left my post on the "Lady Franklin" and undertaken the supervision of a large machine-ship; yet I still retained a pleasant recollection of my railway days, and to-night, as I stood on the old familiar ground, with the well-known sights and sounds around me, and the "Lady" gliding out of her place of shelter with burnished sides and flaming headlights, I almost wished myself back again in my old post.

"Yes, I thought I should. How's the old Lady? Holds her own pretty well?"

"Better than the new ones a deal!" said the conductor, enthusiastically viewing the fiery-throated monster as she puffed and groaned, ran backward a few steps, and then darted forward, in a manner entirely enigmatical to any but our initiated selves.

"She looks as trim as a city belle!"

"Yes, MacLeod keeps her well up. I say, Frank, MacLeod's wife is going through to-night."

I knew he was looking closely at me, scrutinizing my countenance; but I managed with an effort to say, quite carelessly and unconcernedly: "Is she?"

Carew had known all about the one disastrous love-affair of my youth; he knew perfectly well that pretty Isabel Martin had suddenly turned round and married John MacLeod after encouraging my suit for nearly a year; and he knew, also, how sensitive I still was on the subject. I had not blamed Isabel so much as some might have been disposed to; she was very young, and entirely under the influence of her father, with whom MacLeod was a great favorite. But none the less I had received a great and enduring shock.

"Poor little Isabel," said Carew, as he reached up to turn down a long jet of gas that threatened to crack its glass globe—"I rather think she has got pretty well sick of MacLeod by this time."

"Why? Does he ill-treat her?"

"Well, I don't suppose he either locks her up on bread-and-water, or beats her; but I do suppose that in every other particular in which a man can neglect or ill-treat a woman, she is neglected and ill-treated."

"The old brute!" I muttered between my teeth.

"Well—I shall see you again," said Carew, vanishing into the crowd with a sinuous ease and swiftness peculiar, I believe, to the race of conductors.

It was a tempestuous night in March—the wind howling and shrieking like an infuriated demon, and the rain beating a stormy fugue on the depot roof, as I advanced to help a woman in who carried a heavy basket.

"Excuse me, madam, but that is too heavy for you to lift!"

She looked up to thank me, but the words died on her lips as her eyes met mine. It was Isabel MacLeod, the lost love whom I still cherished in my heart of hearts, and the wife of the engineer on the Night Express. I was the first to recover my composure; for this, be it remembered, was the first time we had met since her marriage, more than three years before.

"Here is a vacant seat, Isabel; do you wish to sit near the stove?"

"It makes no difference," said Isabel hurriedly. "I am very much obliged to you, Mr. Atwater."

"How does it happen that you are going through such a stormy night?" I asked, unmindful of her evident anxiety to be left alone.

"I do not know myself, except that John wishes it."

Still I lingered. "Is there anything more I can do for you, Isabel?"

There was no answer. I stooped my head a little lower.

"Isabel, you are crying! What has grieved you? Tell me what the trouble is?"

"Nothing—nothing," she sobbed behind her veil. "Only—I had not seen you in so long a time, and it was like the old days once more; and—and I am very foolish. Please leave me now, won't you?"

I obeyed her, puzzled and indignant. Carew was right. A happy wife does not burst out crying when she meets the friends of her girlhood; a happy wife's look is far different from that pale, frightened face. I felt strongly inclined to go straight out to John MeLeod's post on the "Lady Franklin" and administer a summary thrashing then and there.

But I checked my rising choler, and contented myself instead with a leisurely saunter through the train, now under full motion. It was very pleasant to find myself once again on the old familiar ground. The brakemen all had a word of respectful greeting for me; the baggage-master insisted on ensconsing me in the single arm chair which graced his car, while he himself sat on a pile of trunks and asked more questions than I could have answered in a week; the express agent issued from his den and demanded to know "where I had been lurking all this time," and even the news-boys grinned as they slid past and accosted me with "How d'ye do, Mr. Atwater?"

But all at once our train slackened its motion, moved more slowly still, and came to a dead stand. I knew that we were an express that stopped but twice before we reached our final destination, and this lonely pine-barren was certainly neither of our stopping places.

"What is it, Carew?" Confound that Warren! What made him report 'all sound' with such a worn box as that? These patent boxes are continually getting hot in the shortest runs, ain't fit for expresses at all."

"We can cool in fifteen minutes, sir," said one of the brakemen, who had his tow and water all ready for backing it anew.

"Fifteen minutes! and we just running on time with the lightning train to catch us at B——."

"It's to bad to get in behind the lightning train," I said.

"Worse for me than McLeod, for though Warren's to blame, I catch the curses. Well, Truefit, do the best you can."

In spite of Truefit's sanguine policy, it was full twenty-five minutes before we were again under way. I had gone back to Isabel MacLeod, whose dilated blue eyes were glancing from one to another in the apprehensive agony of terror that no one but a nervous woman can fully appreciate.

"Frank— Mr. Atwater! do tell me what is the matter!"

"Only a 'hot box'—there is no occasion for uneasiness."

"Upon your sacred honor?"

"Upon my sacred honor. Why, Isabel how frightened you are. I can see you tremble even here. What is the matter, child?,'

"Sit down and I will tell you," she said, hurriedly motioning me toward a vacant seat directly back of her. "I know it is a piece of mad folly—a—a—delusion; but I must tell somebody or I shall go mad."

I sat down, leaning forward with my elbows on the top of the seat she occupied, so that my face nearly touched her heavy black veil.

"First promise never to tell him—John."

"I promise."

"Well, then," she went on, speaking in a husky, nervous whisper, "he is very peculiar—full of the strongest fancies. When I first married him I thought it was superstition merely—now—"

"Well, now?" I questioned.

"Now, I do not know what to think. Oh, Mr. Atwater, I ought not to say so, I know, but I am the most miserable creature in the world."

"Isabel."

"I am. He threatens sometimes to shut me up in a madhouse, and perhaps I should be happier there than subject to his whims and cruelties. Why do you suppose he brought me here to-night?"

"I am sure I do not know."

"He told me," she whispered, clasping her hands tightly together as she spoke, "that we were coming out to see death to-night, and I must come. Oh, Frank, what do you suppose he means?"

"Only to terrify you," I said soothingly. "He is a bundle of old Scotch superstitions, and always was."

"And, Frank, once when I thought I heard footsteps close behind us, and turned my head to see, he jerked my arm and told me not to look—that—oh, Frank, it makes my blood run cold now—that it was Death walking at our side!"

"But, Isabel, surely you will not allow yourself to be influenced by such folly as this?"

"I told you it was folly," she answered, dejectedly; "but——"

A hand was laid on my arm at this moment—the hand of Carew, the conductor.

"Frank, look here, I want to speak to you," he said hurriedly. "Come here—out on the platform."

I followed him out into the stormy darkness of the March night, where his lantern gleamed like a sullen, shifting eye.

"What is it? Anything wrong?"

"Yes and no. Of course you know we're nearly half an hour behind time, with not quite thirty minutes between us and the lightning train."

"Yes. What of that?"

"Well, that old fool, MacLeod, has turned crusty, and says if we don't run out on the side track at Speedville, the next station, and wait for the 'lightning' to pass, he'll not be answerable for the consequences."

"Who wants him to be answerable?" I demanded, with considerable acerbity, not to say disdain.

"Well, he says it's a bad night, track slippery, and all that sort of thing; and I suppose it's all very true. But you know the 'Lady Franklin' of old. She'll keep the thirty minutes between us and the 'lightning,' won't she?"

"I should say there was no kind of doubt as to that. Ain't you going to make up that lost time?"

"That's just the trouble. That crack-brained old Scotch fool wants to stop and lose another half hour, which we may just as well gain, and run into B——on time, as to come trailing along behind the 'lightning.' But MacLeod refuses to run her unless I consent to his conditions. Frank, why can't you take the old 'Lady' into B——?"

"I'll do it with all the pleasure in life."

Carew's face brightened at once.

"What a lucky thing it is you chanced to be on the train!" he said. "I should have been entirely at Mac's mercy if it hadn't been for you. Come on: there's no time to be lost."

I followed him through the long train to the engine, and entered the little enclosed compartment where MacLeod sat among his screws and valves and dials, like some magician of old surrounded by the abstruse implements of his art. How like home the tiny place appeared to me! It seemed almost as if the "Lady Franklin" shot more swiftly over the track as I stepped upon her. MacLeod inclined his head stiffly in answer to my greeting. He was a tall, spare Scotchman, with deep-set blue eyes, thatched with shaggy brows, and hair already sprinkled with gray, though he could scarcely have been more than thirty years old. His face was cold and repulsive, and his manner forbidding in the extremest degree. Moreover, he had a way, exceedingly unpleasant to the spectator of continually looking over his shoulder with a sort of spasmodic motion, as if he had suddenly seen or heard something close behind him. As I threw myself down beside him he pointed to the place beyond.

"Sit there, if you please, Mr. Atwater."

I wondered, but complied, and Carew spoke pleasantly.

"Well, MacLeod, shall we put on steam and drive her ahead?"

"No, Mr. Carew," said the Scotchman, cold and firmly. "Either we run out on the side track three miles ahead, as I have explained, or I leave the engine."

"But why are you so determined?" I asked.

"I don't conceive it to be my business to answer any of your questions, Francis Atwater," said MacLeod, "but I have no objection to gratify your curiosity. I am 'so determined' because I see further than you or Mr. Carew here, and I see danger—danger!"

"How? and where?"

"You are a practical engineer, and ask where is the danger on such a night as this, with the 'Lightning Express' close behind, and we twenty-five minutes after our time? Do you know that we are not only responsible for Atwater and Carew and John MacLeod, but for all the passengers on this train? Do you want the sin of a murder on your soul?"

He spoke in a sharp voice that was almost a scream.

"That is not the question," said Carew, "and all nonsense besides. Isn't the light hung out behind, and can't you tell when we are gaining or losing time? Once for all, will you or will you not do your best to gain time and keep ahead of the 'Lightning?'"

"No; I will not," he answered sullenly.

"Very well, here is a substitute that will. Make room for Mr. Atwater!"

"He can do as he pleases," said Mr. MacLeod, stiffly, rising to yield me his place. "I wash my hands of the whole thing, now and hereafter. Bear witness, Carew and Atwater, that I protest against this rash and fool-hardy thing?"

Not a word more did he utter, but sat down silent and rigid as a galvanized corpse, watching me with his deep-set eyes until the very consciousness of that steady surveillance made me uncomfortable. Uncomfortable, but not nervous. I never, in the whole course of my life, was more entirely in possession of all my faculties, or more composed than at that moment, as I mechanically examined screws and valves and satisfied myself as to the correctness of every detail. All was right;

MacLeod was a good engineer if not an agreeable companion.

"Now then, my 'Lady,'" I said to myself, "we'll see if you keep up all your old pluck!"

I turned to give some directions to the fireman, and when I was about to sit down MacLeod seized my arm.

"Not there? I tell you not there!"

"And why not there?" I demanded, with a momentary fear crossing my mind that the man was deranged.

"Because another already occupies the place," he cried in the shrill, shrieking voice he often used when much excited. "Death is a passenger on this train with us, and Death sits there ghastly and still! No, I know you don't see him; but second sight is a gift in the family I come from, and I see him. I would have warded off his fell errand, but you—you and that cursed Carew wouldn't let me. Now go your own mad, reckless way, and see where it will bring you. And remember, Frank Atwater, that its not your own worthless life that hangs in the balance, but the lives of all who travel on this train."

Argument with a man in this excited frame of mind would have been but folly. I sat down without a word, smiling in spite of myself, and resumed my intent supervision of the engine while MacLeod sat silently by with folded arms.

"Never did the "Lady Franklin" show finer mettle than on that night. The machinery was perfect, the cranks well oiled, the heat steady and intense. The firemen worked in concert with me, fully comprehending my intention, and the "Lady" rushed over the rails like a living, breathing thing.

"How are you getting along, Frank?" asked Carew, coming forward with his lantern as we left our stopping-place.

"Oh, splendidly!" I answered.

"I have just telegraphed back to Seldtown; we have gained five minutes on the 'Lightning' already."

"I thought we were gaining," I replied, quietly. But I was very much excited. The idea of pressing this magnificent piece of machinery to its utmost speed I of eluding the lightning pursuit of the express which followed—pursued us; of identifying my own nerves and sinews with the iron and steel of the "Lady Franklin," was exciting in itself, nor had MacLeod's wild talk been entirely without effect on me.

"I wish we were at B——," I thought, leaning my elbows on the wood-work and gazing out into the stormy night athwart which our huge headlight threw a streaming banner of lurid light as it rushed along. At this instant my shoulder was touched.

"Atwater," said MacLeod, in a husky, unnatural voice, "Death is very, very near to you!"

A cold chill ran through me.

"I am always prepared to meet death," I answered, trying to speak composedly.

"Death? yes, but not death by suicide. You will be a suicido, Francis Atwater."

"Oh, MacLeod, don't talk nonsense. Go back to the baggage-car and sleep the liquor off."

"Liquor? You think I'm drunk. You think I'm mad. You think me to be superstitious. I heard you—I heard you talking to her. You'd best keep clear of her, young man. You see this, eh?" and he drew a huge knife from his bosom.

"Yes, I see it," I answered, laying my hand on the brake, as if I could use it for defence.

"With this I could have sacrificed you long ago, and saved the victims you are sacrificing. But I preferred not. What is to be is to be; as well might I endeavor to stem the current of the Mississippi with a straw as to check the tide of Fate with my feeble hand!"

My heart seemed to stand still with deadly terror. Was I indeed shut up in this narrow spot with a maniac? Would I be murdered before I could call for help? But I remembered that in coolness and presence of mind lay my only chance of safety, and resolved to abide the result. We were now pulling on the brakes for our second and last stopping place ere we reached B——. MacLeod sprang out upon the platform as we stopped, and went into a bar-room adjoining the station. I went back and spoke to one of the brakemen, an athletic Maine man, with thews and sinews of iron, and the stature of a giant.

"Jim," I said in a low voice—his name was Jim Torrence—"I want you to keep your eye on MacLeod, and come on the locomotive with me. He talks and acts very strangely to-night; and he may attempt some violence."

"I saw him draw out that outlandish knife o' his, sir, a minute or two ago," said Jim, shrewdly. "I could easily jerk it away from him when we're movin' again."

"No, I do not wish you to use force of any kind unless it is absolutely necessary. I think he is harmless, but it's just as well to keep a little watch over him."

"He's queer," said Jim "I'll keep an eye on him."

Once more, after a ten minutes' stop, the little signal-bell sounded "Go-ahead!" the brakes moved noisily, and the wheels began to revolve. MacLeod had not returned to his place by my side, and I began heartily to hope that he designed to favor me with no more of his society. I was overjoyed to feel this, and in much lighter spirits than usual I let on the steam, and was soon going at a rapid rate. Three or four hundred yards from the depot the road ran through a deep cut, and just beyond it was a corresponding "fill" or embankment about ten feet high. The engineers, that is, the "surveyors," as we mechanical engineers insist, half-sneeringly, in calling them, had, with very bad taste, made a "compound curve" here, so that, before entering the "cut," I could see nothing in it, and when I was in the "cut" I could see nothing beyond it. So, of course, we had to go through with whistle blowing and usually at a slow gait. But feeling in good spirits at MacLeod's absence, the prospect of a good run, having the "Lady" in fine condition, with the trains we were to meet reported "all right" and the track clear, I "let the dogs loose," opened the valves, dashed through the cut and—

Very, very nearly into eternity. Danger is said to be very fascinating; it is particularly so when you see it coming, have time to reflect upon it, and plan and execute a rescue or what you hope to prove so. I saw it plainly this night, the rail half removed, the figure of the man still bent on his hellish work. I saw him as he completed it, saw him shake his fist savagely at me and jump aside to watch the slaughter he had plotted. I was not a second in sounding "down brakes," not an instant in reversing the engine, but nothing could have saved that train except the mad-man's "lack of method," or want of skill of the despised surveyors. The absence of this knowledge, perhaps for want of time, MacLeod had removed but one rail, and that the inside one of the curve. I knew if I could check the "Lady's" speed she would not leave the track, as the outside one is the one which guides the train on a curve, and this was intact. Jim Torrence had come on the locomotive with me, and I turned to tell him to jump for his life when I saw him standing upright in the centre of the tender, grasping a huge block of wood and his eyes gleaming like coals. It was no time to look after his safety; I saw him hurl the stick of wood at MacLeod as he ran down the embankment, and the next minute we struck the ground, and plunged into the bank.

My calculations had been correct. Jolting violently over several cross-ties, shattering "cowcatcher" and "headlight," smashing the baggage and first passenger car; throwing Jim Torrence with great violence from the tender on the locomotive, leaving him senseless by the shock, and nearly throwing me on to the boiler, the "Lady" stuck and stopped without leaving the track, except upon the side where MacLeod had removed the rail. We were disabled for the time, with nobody but Jim seriously injured.

Except MacLeod. Jim's aim had been too true, and the block of wood, hurled with all his force, gaining additional velocity from that of the train, had struck MacLeod as he ran, and felled him senseless—the fact is, as we soon found, dead. The billet had struck him and killed him. Jim Torrence was never tried for it on earth; poor fellow, he's gone since, and I don't much think they recorded any verdict against him in Heaven.

After Jim was taken care of, the lanterns put out ahead and behind us to warn approaching trains, and the disabled train was gone through to see after the wounded, John MacLeod's corpse was taken up and carried back to the station which he had just left.

"Frank" said Carew, when matters were slightly settled again, "who is to tell the story to Mac's wife?"

"She does not suspect anything—that is, she don't know how it occurred."

"She knows there has been an accident, but she doesn't know that Mac was thrown out of the locomotive, and is the only one killed."

Good! Even carew did not suspect how MacLeod had been felled by Torrance's blow and killed.

"I will tell her," I said, determined that she should never know his crime, nor learn how he had been terribly and suddenly punished.

Her grief was terrible to witness. She lay on my shoulder and sobbed half the night away, but it was less from love of the man who had always been cruel to her, than from her woman's nervousness. At the inquest next day, when she identified his body, and told the story of his misanthropy and superstition to the jury, she was more collected, and surprised me by her calmness. The jury thought its course in the matter plain sailing—no suspicion of the man's crime arose; Torrance and myself were not examined; we kept our secret to ourselves, and the jury brought in its verdict of "Death by accident." They knew nothing of his chief incentive to the crime—the chief cause of his death—jealousy.

I have told the story of my midnight trip on the "Lady Franklin." Is it necessary to tell any more? Sudden transition from death-scenes to marriage ceremonies are always as offensive in the telling as in the hearing; and therefore I think it useless as well as in bad taste to waste further words in saying, that just one year and a half after the fatal accident I took Isabel home as my wife, and that ever since, by God's help, I've made her a happy wife, and repaired the wrongs of her youth by being a good and kind husband to her.

THE best penance we can do for envying another's merit is to endeavor to surpass it.

HOW WE GET SARDINES.

INSTEAD of employing nets, the French use bait for catching the millions of sardines which they annually take from the sea, and cure for the gratification of epicurean tastes. This makes the fishery a very expensive one, more especially as they use only the roe of the codfish. On the shores of the North Sea, fisheries have been established solely for the purpose of providing the eggs of the codfish as bait for the French sardines. The roe costs fifty francs (£2) per barrel; each boat employed in the sardine fishery will use about fifteen barrels every season, and, as there are about three thousand sardine boats on the coast of Brittany, the money paid for bait is enormous. The number of codfish killed to furnish the bait is immense. The capture and cure of the sardines is a great business in France, especially at Concarneau, where as many as thirteen thousand men are engaged in it, directly and indirectly. There are no statistics to show the number of sardines caught and cured, but it is wonderful. Besides the large quantity exported, as many as four million boxes are cured in oil for home consumption, while enormous quantities are sold fresh, and in tins and barrels. The curers buy from day to day what they want, and no more; they do not generally make contracts with boats, and only a few firms own boats. As soon as the fishermen come in with their fares, the sardines are put in train for cure by being beheaded, sorted into sizes and whashed, which is mostly done by women, who earn about fourteen or sixteen shillings a week. The cure is begun by drying the fish in the open air, after which they are placed in great pans over furnaces and boiled in oil. Into this the fish are plunged, two rows deep, arranged on wire gratings. In this oil (the very finest olive) they remain for a brief period, till, in the judgment of the cook, they are done. Then they are placed to drip, the drippings being carefully saved, after which they are packed by women and girls into the little boxes in which they are sold. Again they are allowed to drip, by the boxes being sloped, and after that each box is filled with pure olive oil. The boxes are hermetically sealed by soldering, and boiled in a steam chest. The debris of the sardines are sold for agricultural purposes, and a large quantity of oil is exuded during the cure, which is of considerable value.

PERSIAN SMOKING ETIQUETTE.—As the Persian is, on all occasions, a careful observer of etiquette, he has numberless ceremonies to be observed with regard to the pipe. He has summer pipes and winter pipes; pipes for different ranks, ages and sexes. When a party is given, for instance, it is de rigueur that pipes be offered to the whole company simultaneously. The servants approach in line, each offers his pipe to the smoker for whom it is destined, at one and the same moment, and it is only when they have retired that the master of the house opens the gurgling concert, all the guests carefully keeping time with him. After a few pulls the pipes are exchanged, both parties observing set formalities, and making many bows as they mutually give and receive this token of esteem and confidence. Neglect in this ceremony is the height of bad breeding, and to put the pipe more than half an inch in the mouth is a mark of great greediness. It must, however, be observed that these niceties of behavior are mentioned not merely by the higher and better educated classes, but are in vogue among the lower orders also, for every Persian wishes to be considered polite. The ladies, who, in Persia, enjoy considerable more freedom than in Turkey, can indulge themselves with smoking with less gene than in the latter country. Young girls and elderly matrons alike spend hours over their pipes, the richer ones accompanying every third whiff with a bit of sugar. As smoking out of the same pipe is accounted a sign of friendly feeling and confidence, the pipe plays an important part in interviews of a tender nature. The expression "to eat out of the same dish" is, in Persia, applied to the pipe. As the fair sex here are even more assidously devoted to the practice of smoking than in Turkey, the mouths of princesses and peasant women alike have a very strong odor.

MEN AMD WOMEN—Men love things—as facts, possessions, and estates; and women, persons; and while a man regards only abstract scientific facts, a woman looks only at the person in whom they are embodied. Even in childhood the little girl loves imitation of humanity, her doll, and works for it; the boy gets a hobby-horse or tools, and works with them. But the noblest quality wherewith nature has endowed woman for the good of the world is love—that love which seeks no sympathy and no return. The child is the object of love and kisses and watching, and answers them only by complaint and anger; and the feeble creature that requires the most repays the least. But the mother goes on; her love only grows stronger the greater the need and unthankfulness of its object, and while fathers prefer the strongest of their children, the mother feels more love for the feeble and garrulous.

THERE are some who, as long as they continue in prosperity scorn good admouitions. Their souls cannot take the good seed without being harrowed by affliction and watered with tears.

LITERARY GLEANINGS.

THE last number of the North British Review contains an article on "American literature," mainly devoted to a discussion of the poetry of Longfellow, Lowell, Whittier, and Bryant. The first named, who is pronounced the greatest of all, is thus characterized:

His works are entirely free from the special defects that stamp the national literature of his country. He has none of the somewhat uncouth power and spasmodic exaggeration of his Western cotemporaries; he is all grace and polish and inexhaustible sweetness. One of his earliest books, "Hyperion," strikes the key-note of the majority of his minor poems. The source of their inspiration is Outre Mer, among Rheuish feudal towers, Flemish towns, and Alpine passes. Like Irving in the variety and extent of his culture, and superior to him in genius, his imagination is rather Teutonic than English. Cut Germany out of his volume, and you cut out nearly half. He lingers in Nuremburg, Bruges, and Prague, and chooses for his emblem of life's river, not the Ohio, nor the Hudson, nor the Assabeth, but "the Moldau's rushing stream." He has given us the best translation in the world from Swedish, German, Spanish, and Italian authors, and many of his best verses are avowedly suggested by old proverbs, or sentences, or bits of old romance. A few words from an old French author give him the burden of the "Old Clock on the Stair;" a leaf out of Mather's Magnalia Christi is rhymed into "The Phantom Ship;" the ballad of the Count Arnaldos sets him dreaming over the "Secret of the Sea;" a verse of Enripides is the overture to his "Voices of the Night;" a few lines from Goethe gather up the essence of the "Psalm of Life." In the New World, but not wholly of it, he dwells with almost wearisome fondness on the word "old." Volumes of old days, old associations that we cannot buy with gold, quaint old cities, old poets and painters, sweet old songs old haunted houses, dear old friends, the gray old manse, Nature the dear old nurse, dear old England—on phrases and thoughts like these his fancy broods. American verse is frequently rough-hewn and audacious, sometimes obscure and pedantic, and its novelty is often more startling than its truth. Every sentence that Longfellow has penned is as clear as crystal and as pure as snow. He wears his weight of learning "lightly as a flower," and though he rarely creates, he cannot touch without adorning. He puts our best thought into the best language, with that high art which conceals itself.

Longfellow's command of verse alone proves him to be a genuine poet. There are passages in the "Arsenal," the "Occultation of Orion," the "Building of the Ship," and the Household Poems, unsurpassed in melody by any in cotemporary English verse. The introduction to "Hiawatha," the closing lines of "Evangeline," and some of the character sketches which preface the tales of the "Wayside Inn," have a music equally attractive and more decidedly original. The hightest flights of Mr. Longfellow's imagination are in the strange old-world story of the "Golden Legend;" but his fame most securely rests on "Hiawatha." This poem, in which a series of idylls are strung together on a thread of an idea common to Indian and Scandinavain legend, has that refreshing flavor of nationality wanting in many of the author's works, and it yields to none of them in artistic finish. The monotony of the verse is like that of the bird's song which has only two or three notes, and yet, from its everlasting freshness, never palls upon the ear. Most modern attempts to produce old ballads put new wine into old bottles; but the American poet has thrown himself as completely into the spirit of aboriginal Western life as he has into that of Gothic Paganism in the "Challenge of Thor." Like Chibabos the musician, he is at home among the pine-groves and the prairies, and "great lakes of the nothlaad," and

"All the many sounds of natures Borrow sweetness from his singing."

Longfellow's descriptions charms us more than they astonish. Inferior in luxuriance to those of "Enoch Arden," in subtility to Browning's Italian pictures, they are superior in simplicity. They do not adorn nature as a mistress with the subjective fancies of a lover; they bring her before as a faithful nurse careful for her children. In "Evangeline" the poet follows the wheels of the emigrant's wagon through "billowy bays of grass, ever rolling in sunshine and shadows," and "over them wander the buffalo herds, and the elk, and the roebuck." "Hiawatha" speaks of natare with the familiarity of an inhabitant; there is no trace of the graadiose style of the tourist. In the best episodes of the volume, as the account of the hero's childhood and his friends, of the wooing of Mianehaha, of the Son of the Evening Star, of the Ghost and the Famine—the parable of human life, with its incidents of birth, love and death, of civilization and decay, is told in a narrative of childlike tenderness and masculine grasp.

This English estimate of our favorite singer, seems all the more gracious, since the half disdainful criticism of "Flower de Luce" in the Saturday Review, in which the poet was treated very much as if he were a sort of American Tapper, with a trifle more of culture and a trifle less of puerility than the great Brightonian philosopher.

SOUTHERN LITERATURE.

In the same article there is some allusion to the literature of the Southern States, with which, however, the writer does seem to be very intimately acquainted. He seems to consider Mr. Calhoun its only representative, never having heard, apparently, of William Gilmore Simms, Doctor Kennedy, Albert G Pike, Miss Augusta J. Evans, and "Bill Arp." The reviewer says:

The boasted culture of the South has always been limited in extent and in degree. The rare hot house fruit of wealth and luxurious leisure, it has been displayed in an appreciation of the advantages of education in the Northern schools—schools which it is impossible to over-praise. In the world of letters, at least, the Southern States have shown by reflected light; nor is it too much to say, that mainly by their connection with the North the Carolinas have been saved from sinking to the level of Mexico and the Antilles. Since the revolution days, it is amazing how few of the thinkers of America have been born south of Mason and Dixon's line. The almost solitary name of Calhoun is a poor equivalent for those of Prescott, Motley, Bancroft, Webster, Lowel, Bryant, Emerson, Sumner, Dana, Holmes, and Hawthorn, which belong to the single state of Massachusetts. Whether we look to India or Louisiana it would seem that there is something in the fire of a tropical sun which takes all the poetic fire out of Anglo-Saxon veins, and the indolence which is the natural concomitant of despotism has the same benumbing effect. Like the Spartan marshaling his Helots, the planter lounging among his slaves was made dead to art by a paralyzing sense of his own superiority. Some years ago a scheme to establish a Southern University was abandoned, because the 'cuticular aristocracy' refused to associate with the teachers. All genuine Transatlantic Literature is inspired by the spirit of confidence in labor. It can only flourish in a free soil, and for all its vitality, all its aspirations, its scant performance and large promise, we must turn to New England. Its defects and merits are those of the national character as developed in the Northern States, and we must explain its peculiarities by reference to the physical and moral conditions by which they are environed.

BATTLE PICTURES.

The London Court Journal says: "Whoever cares to look through the battle pictures in illustrated serials will find much food for astonishment. Though the contest may rage at its climax, no disagreeable smoke clouds the combatants, but every object is revealed with obliging clearness. Some firing may go on here and there, but the field is principally occupied by infantry charging with the bayonet. In precision so beautifully do the troops move that a straight line drawn from the tip of the bayonet of the first man on the left would graze every intervening point, not one weapon being a hair's breadth beyond the line or short of it Every left hand grips the barrel at the same distance from the hands; every right hand exactly clutches the small of the piece; every but protrudes to the same distance to the rear. And so perfectly 'dressed' is the line, that if each man should glance to the right or left, he would see precisely the required 'buttons' on his neighbor's coat. All right legs are stepping out at the same time, and all the left heels are at the same elevation behind. Looking at such a picture, one cannot help calculating the effect of a single shot enfilading the line, and clipping off fifty or sixty heads at once. It would be as fatal as Munchausen's ramrod, which spitted a whole platoon of birds at one fire, or, as the wondrous cannon ball discharged by the beseiged Major Gahagan."

"Universal Suffrage" is the title of a pamphlet of about a hundred pages, promulgating the opinion that negroes ought not to vote if they are too ignorant, and that women should not undertake to exercise the right of suffrage because they have already enough to do in washing dishes, tending the babies, and looking pretty. This startling contribution to the ideas of the age, is from "A Republican, (not a Radical,") and is published by Lippincott & Co.

Windsor Castle is as complete a residence as there is in the world. To get in one wants a guide as much as one does in a strange town. People who go to Windsor from London are charmed with the ease with which a ticket to enter is granted. But the Queen and royal apartments are as completely hid as if the visitor had gone in search of her Majesty to New York. She is not over gracious to her minister who breaks in on official matters on her privacy. Lords in Waiting are often kept outside by the hour. A gentleman who went to be knighted said that her "gracious Majesty" was not specially gracious; that, when she took the sword, she looked quite savage enongh to have run him through—that, as he came up to kiss her hand, as is the custom of those who are so distinguished, she gave him the simple ends of her fingers and pulled them back with a jerk, leaving him to this day in doubt whether he has really enjoyed the high honor of kissing her hand. Noble ladies are kept waiting like common servants, on a bench, till the Queen is in humor to receive them.

The London Review has an extended notice of Walt Whitman's Works. It says: "He is far more chaste than Mr. Swinburne, whom he resembles in many particulars; he is not more irreverent than Shelley; he is in some points more dramatic than either, and far less hurtful. There is a wild, natural exuberance of animalism displayed by Whitman, of a thoroughly original kind, open air abandonment, a weird and exalted receptivity, embracing the good and the bad, the vice and the virtue of life, with a power and comprehensiveness as striking as it is novel. If he will but learn to tame a little, America will at least have a genuine American poet."

MISCELLANEA.

The unusual success of the Mühlbach historical novels already brought out by Appleton & Co., has lead this house to add largely to its list of author's works intended for speedy publication. In addition to a score or more of Mühlbach's novels, a half a dozen of her husband's productions, in the same field of fiction, are announced to be brought out with them. The newest issue of the Mühlbach series, is "Louisa of Prassia," a deeply interesting story of the times of the first Bonaparte. Among the personages who figure in the romance, are the young Queen of Prussia, Bonaparte and Josephine, Joseph Hayden, Prince Lichtenstein, Johannes Muller, Victoria de Poutel, and others who played an important part in social and political affairs. Besides the strong dramatic and personal interest of the romance, the work illustrates an important period in German history, protraying, with marked ability, the causes and consequences of the fall of the German Empire.

Lamartine has just taken up his residence in his new villa in the Bois de Boulogne, a charming habitation presented to him by the city of Paris. The panneaux which decorate the salle á manger are from the pencil of Madame Lamartine. "I visited Lamartine in his new and beautiful home, a few days ago," writes the author of "Record," "and found the poet, who is nearly eighty, as active and cheerful as a man of forty. Lamartine will never be old—though his locks are white, his heart is young. In appearance he has changed very little since I used to visit almost every day in 1860."

"Forest and Field" is the title of a new sporting book recently brought out in London, and pronounced by the leading journals as one of the most thrilling of its kind. Since the days of Le Vaillant, nothing so fresh and stirring has been offered to the public. The hunting experiences which it narrates belong to the jungles of Hindostan. The author is Major Leverson, who writes under the nom de plume of the "Old Shekarry," (the Hindoo word for sportsman.) The Court Journal says:—"The music of the rifle rings through every period, with the crash of the huge game breaking through the forest, and whatever other sounds are familiar to the Eastern mountains, The reader partakes of all the wild delights of an oriental chase. What these are, the eye will discover at a glance from the illustrations, where the huge tiger stalks bleeding over the jungle, and herds of wounded and enraged elephants scour over height and hollow."

Caligula's Horse.—Caligula's horse lived in a regular palace; the manger was of marble and it is said that his oats were gilded. A palatial residence for horses is the St. Lawrence Stables, 212 Sutter street, above Kearny. W. E. Bridge has the most superb accommodations for his equine boarders. There are fifty-one stalls in the second story, and thirty-five in the basement. On the first floor are the lightest and most elegant buggies in the State. The building has one hundred feet of hose attached to it and should a fire break out it would be speedily extinguished.

A Valuable Invention.—California has produced many inventors of useful articles which are appreciated, not only here but in all parts of the world. The wooden-spring thorough-brace double buggies are the lightest and strongest in the world. With the exception of the wheels, these vehicles are constructed of only five pieces of wood. These buggies are the invention of Geo. P. Kimball & Co., and can be seen, together with an immense assortment of circular front coupés, circular double-front demi-clarences and other carriages, at his celebrated factory, 769 Market street, near Fourth.

Parker, Wattson & Co.—This new firm, is old in the tobacco The head of the firm, Mr. Parker, has been for a number of years engaged in the tobacco business, and is as completely posted in the merits of the various choice brands of tobacco as any man in San Francisco. Their business arrangements with the Eastern shippers are thoroughly organized, and they have a stock of tobacco and cigars on hand that can be safely recommended to the attention of the interior deales.

"Gentlemen's Delight."—B. C. Horn, corner of Front and Clay streets, has just received the "Gentlemen's Delight." Our readers will be anxious to know what manner of delight it is. There are so many things the male creatures delight in that it is our duty to inform our friends that this particular delight is an invoice of very superior Virginia chewing tobacco, bearing the vignette of a beautiful lady and branded as above.

Laurel Hall.—One of the handsomest saloons in this city has been opened on Pine street, the next door east of the California Market. The doors, panel-work and counter are all made of that beautiful wood, California Laurel, polished by Boyd. John Duris, the proprietor, has stocked his bar with the finest quality of wines and liquors, whid. he sells at wholesale and retail.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE TO THE "CALIFORNIAN."]

BOHEMIAN PALACE, AUG. 1867.

FIRST I will address myself to Santa Rosa, the capital of Sonoma County. To describe a "country town," and describe it handsomely is a feat of words not easily performed, especially if the town itself is not handsome. Santa Rosa is pretty, however, and differs but little in its general appearance from one of the small country towns you find throughout the States of New York, Pennsylvania or Ohio. It contains 1,000 inhabitants, has a very fine court house, excellent county-officer's quarters, a large county infirmary, a number of churches and other necessary appendages of a high state of civilization. The country surrounding Santa Rosa is rich and productive. Wheat is the great staple, but not in this alone lies the wealth of the people. The fruit and grape produce of this portion of the country form no inconsiderable revenue, and each year adds largely to the increase.

The crops the present Summer will make an average yield. Owing to the fact that there has been a prevalence of north winds, and that the fogs have not been as numerous and heavy as in some seasons past, the yield per acre of the various cereals will not be as large as those of some former years.

You will be pleased to learn that THE CALIFORNIAN has many friends here, and that the many intelligent ladies and gentlemen with whom I have conversed, pronounce it "just the kind of a paper needed in every family of intelligence and refinement." I mention this to show you the appreciation in which THE CALIFORNIAN is held by the people at large, and it is not in any sense to be considered a "puff," as the paper is its own eulogy. Mr. Dorchert (firm of P. Cowen & Co.,) keeps a full supply of your journal on hand.

PERSONAL.

Gen. O. H. La Grange, formerly the gallant commander of a cavalry brigade in the old army of the Cumberland, at whose headquarters the writer has spent many pleasant days, has been here during my stay, and made an eloquent address on "the great issue now before the people."

Major Wm. Governeur Morris, of Suscol, I have also had the pleasure of meeting. The Major is one of the most facetious conversationalists I have met in a long time, and from the fact that he has been a reader of THE CALIFORNIAN for the last three years, he is a most temperate and exemplary gentleman in all respects.

To Messrs. Thompson and Ferral, of the Democrat, Dr. Spencer, Mr. Maxwell, and other citizens of this place I am indebted for many and repeated courtesies.

HEALDSBURG.

This is decidedly a picturesque little town, and handomely located. To add to its charms, the people should immediately fence the plaza and plant out trees, shrubbery and flowers. Nature has adorned it with a forest of fine oaks, and otherwise added to its natural attractions.

Messrs. Fenno & White keep THE CALIFORNIAN for sale at their counters in the Postoffice, and Mr. John B. Fitch, formerly publisher of the Standard, of this place, will hereafter attend to its interests in the country, and take active interest in adding to its circulation.

During my visit I have made myself at home at the Sotoyome House, B. C. Wright, proprietor. The Sotoyome is a handsome brick hotel, kept in good style. Mr. W. takes pleasure in ministering to the comforts of his guests, and one feels very much at home with so genial a host. He takes THE CALIFORNIAN, and asserts that he "thinks his ladies' parlor would not be complete without such a piece of intellectual furniture."

I called upon Mr. Menefee, of The Standard, had a pleasant visit and enjoyed the courtesies of the office. Mr. F. makes war on his enemies with Democratic weapons, and I send you a copy of his paper that you may judge as to his aggressive style upon the old enemy of the "unterrified."

MORSE, WOODWARD & CO.'S STAGE LINE.

This excellent line of stages, running from Petaluma and all intermediate points to Mendocino, is doing a large business. The principal agent and past proprietor of the line at Petaluma, Mr. G. W. Leihy, is an active business man and always on hand to attend to the wants of the traveling public. His knowledge of the country and his affable way of doing the agreeable, no doubt add to, and increase the popularity of the line. Mr. Edward P. Colgan, its agent at Santa Rosa, is also a faithful representative of the company's interests. This line makes excellent time and is inclined to be "fast."

A WORD TO DIMINUTIVE POLITICIANS.

If there be any one thing of which the public is heartily sick and tired, it is the political cant and acrimony of small politicians. The idea of inculcating the doctrine that the Model Republic is to be no more because Brown is elected over Jones by a handsome majority, is so preposterous that any sensible man would scarcely believe that the most obtuse and erratic politician could so far forget the dignity of the people as to heap such insults upon them. Yet, I have actually heard "stump speakers" orate to this effect. The burden of their song ended to the chorus in this way: "Gentlemen, and fellow citizens, unless you cast your united ballot for the Hon. Charles Harvywright, our present candidate for the honors of the Governorship of the great State of California and thus smite the rebellious enemy on the hip, nothing beneath the starry heavens can save us from a bloody revolution. That grand old flag, [pointing to the Stars and Stripes,] which we all [the italics are ours,] love so well, must be protected from the hand of 'traitors' and the polluting touch of their base defilement." Now, the idea of one class of citizens publicly denouncing another class as "traitors," is certainly stretching our loyalty, especially when it has been repeatedly proclaimed that peace and tranquility has been restored, and that that same flag floats free and untrammelled throughout the Republic from the pine forests of Maine, to the golden shores of the Pacific, and from the great lakes on the north to the bright waters of Mexico's gulf on the south. If the nation ever proclaims another day of fast and praying, let it be for the conversion of small fry politicians to a restoration of common sense and a few grains of charity. The people have been bored to death by their wails and lamentations. And if fasting and praying will do them no good, let us transport them to Sitka or New Jersey. Indeed, let us do anything to rid ourselves of so pestilent an incumbrance.

A RAILROAD NEEDED.

The people of Sonoma Valley are very much in need of a railroad. A line is in contemplation of being built, to run from Sonoma through Petaluma, Santa Rosa and Healdsburg, thence reaching out to a point where it is thought it may make connection with the Napa Valley railroad, running from Suscol on San Pablo Bay, to Calistoga and through to Clear Lake. The completion of these lines must add greatly to the developement of the rich and fertile valleys through which they run. The Napa road is already in good running order for the distance of twenty miles. The Sonoma line is in embryo, but has as yet taken no definite shape. The farmers of the valleys are, I believe, eager to have these public highways completed, but some of the inland towns are said to be averse thereto. Why this should be, it is difficult to perceive. But there may be movements behind the scenes in which we are uninitiated. However. this may be, public opinion is confirmed as to the great necessity and want of railways through both valleys.

A CHANGE OF AIR.

It would hardly be believed that the atmosphere in this locality is about ten degrees warmer than at San Francisco. Throughout the day here it is quite hot, though nothing that you might call oppressive, while the late afternoons and evenings are pleasant and balmy. The high winds and dust so prevalent at the Bay, have no being here, and the spirit of Borreas seems to be possessed by a tranquillity decidedly charming. For a delightful climate, I believe the upper portions of Sonoma Valley are unrivalled. If we had no rainy season in this country, I am of the opinion that throughout the entire year it would be as Paradaisical a place of abode as the poetic valley Chasmere. But all good things in this mundane sphere are mixed up with unpleasant anecdotes, and we must take the bitter with the sweet.

FOR THE GEYSERS.

Your correspondent leaves for the famous Geyser Springs so-morrow morning, from which point I shall again address your readers. As the route from this place to the Geysers has the reputation of being somewhat attractive, shall see how it meets with our views. I am interested in making the trip across the perilous "Hog's Back," but presume that the perils are more imaginative than real.

CONCLUSION.

There must be an ending to everything earthly, except woman's fancies, and a Bohemian's wealth. So, acting upon this belief, I will close my letter and allow my readers to indulge in a conclusion that comes, perhaps, with a welcome. When next we do sweet converse hold, in the columns of THE CALIFORNIAN, we promise——ah! well, promises are shadowy dreams; performances make the man.

DR. ADONIS.

ITALIAN OPERA.—Crispino e la Comare, given with such success on Friday of last week, for Mancusi's benefit, was repeated on Wednesday evening, to a crowded house, for the benefit of the chorus. On Thursday evening Mr. Tibbetts, the manager, had an overflowing house for his benefit, the opera being L'Africaine, which was given with great perfection. Signor Carmini Morley, who undertook the role of "Vasco di Gama," acquitted himself admirably. L'Africaine will be repeated on Tuesday. On Wednesday evening Signor Milleri, who has shared the losses of the season, will present Un Ballo in Maschera for his benefit, which we trust will be a handsome pecuniary success. The prospect of another season is doubtful, although we believe that in a larger house it might be undertaken without much risk. Perhaps the artists themselves will form a company for the purpose.

DRAMATIC AFFAIRS.

TO-NIGHT, Edwin Adams terminates his engagement at Maguire's Opera House. It has proved the most successful ever played in this city. The week was devoted to pieces in which Mr. Adams had previously appeared. The house has been crowded every night. On Monday Hamlet was performed, on Tuesday Macbeth, on Wednesday Wild Oats, on Thursday Richard III. Last night Mr. Adams took his farewell benefit, appearing as "Robert Landry," in the Dead Heart. This afternoon The Ticket-of-Leave Man will be played, and this evening Mr. Adams will appear in his great character of "Hamlet." On Monday, Henry Edwards, one of the most scholarly and conscientious actors ever seen on the San Francisco boards, will receive a benefit, kindly tendered him by Edwin Adams. The public of San Francisco have evinced most decidedly of late a taste for Shakspeare. Mr. Edwards has chosen Henry IV for his benefit. The cast is a strong one, and the play will be put on the stage in excellent style. All believe most firmly in the sterling talent of Mr. Edwards, and I hope that they will give substantial evidence of the faith that is in them, by crowding the house. On Tuesday, Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Bates, who arrived here some time ago from the East, will make their first appearance in this city in the play of Camille.

The company at the Metropolitan Theatre has received an addition which renders it one of the most complete ever formed in this city. On Monday, Alexander Fitzgerald made his debut before a California audience in the play of Belphegor the Mountebank. In choosing this play to make his first appearance in, Mr. Fitzgerald made a mistake. The long, dreary first act was a severe test of his abilities, and, though he received a call before the curtain on its conclusion, he owed the reception of that compliment more to the generosity and kindly feeling of the audience than to any display of talent. The facts that he was nervous and had not recovered from the effects of a long sea voyage, were taken into consideration. In the second act, Mr. Fitzgerald redeemed himself, and showed that he was really a good actor. Possessing a fine voice, a handsome stage presence, natural talent and much experience, this actor is sure to become a favorite, if he will play parts which people care to see. Mrs. Harry Jackson played "Madeline" admirably well, Harry Jackson made a capital "Fanfaronade," Miss Emma Howson played the part of "Zephyriana" with great spirit, and Miss Clelia Howson exhibited much talent in the role of "Henri." On Tuesday Mr. Fitzgerald appeared as "Connor the Rash" in the Knight of Arva, and gave general satisfaction; in the character of "Ruy Gomez" in Faint Heart never won Fair Lady he was still more happy. Mrs. Harry Jackson's impersonation of the "Duchess de Torraneva" was extremely fine; and Miss Clelia Howson acted the character of the young king of Spain, charmingly. Mrs. Saunders caused much amusement by her clever acting in the role of the "Duenna." The same bill was played on Wednesday night. On Thursday evening The Serious Family was performed. Mr. Fitzgerald's "Captain Murphy Maguire" was rather heavy, but he made some neat points. Mrs. Jackson acted the character of "Mrs. Ormsby Delmaine," charmingly; she never looked more handsome nor played with greater spirit; the "coiffure" which adorned her head was a wonder to behold, and this style of head dress must inevitably become very fashionable. Harry Jackson's "Aminidab Sleek" was not an artistic performance; he failed to satisfactorily assume the whining drawl of the canting preacher. Miss Emma Howson made a charmingly demure "Mrs. Charles Torrens. Mrs. Saunders acted the part of "Lady Sowerby Creamly" admirably, keeping the audience in roars of laughter during the whole time she was on the stage. Miss Clelia Howson charmed everyone by the arch manner in which she played the character of "Emma Torrens;" this young actress sets a good example to many older ones; she is always in earnest, and shows respect for her profession and the public, by doing her very best in whatever part she may appear. John Howson played "Charles Torrens" very well, especially in the two last acts, and the play was, as a whole, capitally presented. Last night, Ingomar was played. This afternoon The Serious Family will be performed, and the evening's entertainment will consist of Ingomar. Great preparations are being made at the Metropolitan Theatre for the production of T. P. Cooke's celebrated prize drama entitled True to the Core. The stage will be entirely metamorphosed on this occasion; the wings will be all cut away, a thrilling ship scene will be presented, and many novel effects will be produced.

Signor Carmini Morley, the talented tenor, whose voice has became unreliable to stand the severe test of an opera season in San Francisco, is, at present, devoting himself to instructing others in the art which he himself so well understands. Signor Morley is a through musical artiste, and by means of his improved method of voicing in a very short space of time developes the full powers of the voice, giving it flexibility, sweetness, and a full musical tone. Music cannot be produced from a badly constructed instrument, and the vocal organs require forming, and tuning, before the music they produce can be perfect. Signor Morley's address can be obtained at the music store of M. Gray, 613 Clay street.

TOUCHSTONE.

MRS. WANG.

AN ADVENTURE IN CHINESE WATERS.

SOME five years ago I was serving in Her Majesty's gunboat Havock, stationed on the coast of China. We had been sent to Hankow, an important trading-place some six hundred miles inland on a large river, to protect the merchants resident there from the incursion of the Celestials, who regarded the "foreign devils," as they called us, with considerable disfavor. No sooner had the gunboat been absent for a few days, settling some disturbances further down the river, than the Hankow merchants got into trouble. It appeared that an army of eighteen hundred Braves, or Imperial soldiers, had passed down the river in a fleet of boats, and, finding themselves inconveniently crowded, had seized and made off with one of Messrs. Dent and Company's large roomy trading junks. Having been put in possession of these facts, we immediately got up steam and went in pursuit. Two hours' hard steaming with the swift current brought us up with them. The fleet had anchored in the mouth of a creek, and there, sure enough, was the trading junk towering above them all. We came to an anchor off the mouth of the creek in such a position that nothing could escape us.

Just at this time a very stately-looking mandarin junk was coming down the river with great parade, and making for the entrance of the creek. A crowd of men were rowing her very swiftly, and enormous banners floated from her mast-head, whilst a profusion of gaudy flags trailed in the water from the spears that were thickly planted around her bow and stern. The gong that had been clanging furiously suddenly ceased as our two boats dashed alongside and we boarded her. After a short scuffle we were in full possession of the vessel, almost before the crew had recovered from their first surprise. We now turned the junk's head round, and made the rowers get their long sweeps out and pull her alongside the Havock. Our movements had not been unnoticed in the creek. The Braves were literally howling with rage, trumpets were braying, and the men, stripped for fighting, were rushing about for their arms in the wildest hurry and confusion. Meanwhile no time was lost in bringing our guns to bear; the ponderous sixty-eight pounder trained slowly round, received its charge, and the Havok showed her teeth.

We waited for the first volley, but our ugly appearance seemed to damp their courage very considerably. I have always noticed that the cool, deliberate way in which our guns are run out and loaded, has an astonishing influence on the Celestial mind; it is so different from their furious, bombastic way of fighting. It was, perhaps, just as well for us that they did cool down, for there would have been more than eight hundred opposed to our forty men, whilst we had the additional inconvenience of having just captured a larger number of the enemy than our own ship's company. Failing to perceive their advantage, they released the trading junk and pushed her out into the stream, and our boats soon towed her alongside.

A boat was then sent in with a gentleman named Doyle, who acted as interpreter for Messrs. Dent and Company, to offer to exchange the mandarin junk and crew for the men who had seized the trading junk. This they refused. As it was now near sunset we shifted our position farther out into the middle of the river, for it would have been most imprudent to have remained within pistol-shot of so numerous and skillful an enemy throughout the darkness of the night. The mandarin's retainers and crew were now transferred from their vessel to ours, and a search was commenced for the mandarin himself, whose euphonious name, Wang, was emblazoned in huge characters on all the banners and everything else in the vessel. It seemed that this Wang was the very gentleman that we most wanted, for he was the general in command of this division of the army.

All the doors of the cabin were strongly barred up from the inside, and for a time defied our attempts to enter. "Now," we thought, "we have you, General Wang!" as the door burst open, and accompanied by another officer and Doyle, I rushed in. Judge of our astonishment when, instead of the old mandarin skulking in a corner in a state of abject terror, as we had expected, we found two of the loveliest girls and the ugliest old woman that is possible to imagine.

The elder girl stood up boldly, her fine face white with rage, and her lustrous black eyes flashing and giving full effect to the volley of curses that she hissed at us through her white and firmly clenched teeth. She was indeed a beautiful girl—such a profusion of glossy black hair, such firmly pencilled eye-brows, strongly arched, and, in her calmer moments, such a sweet little red mouth. Her figure was good, her hands, too, were of the smallest, and fingers the most delicately tapered, whilst her feet must have been to a Chinaman something maddening, they were so incredibly small. The dress that she wore suited her admirably; it was of a rich dark purple satin, lined with white fur, and embroidered round the edge with gold and bright colors.

Close behind her stood the other girl. She was apparently a year or so younger, and was a faint reflection of her companion. She in the bud was the promise of as fair a flower as the other, and was wonderfully pretty. Her dress was not so magnificent as her sister's—for they were evidently sisters—but was still exceedingly handsome. She, though in very great terror, seemed to have unbounded confidence in her elder sister, to whom she clung as though for protection. The old woman sat muttering in the corner, and groaned out the direst imprecations on us and our fathers before us; but of these, since they amused her without affecting us, we took no notice. She would have been at any time ugly enough, but her impotent rage now rendered her doubly hideous. We searched every part of the vessel, but were unable to find Wang. It appeared that he had indeed come down in the junk, but during the hurry and confusion of the capture, had managed to jump overboard and get away.

As I have said, we were accompanied by Doyle, and by his aid we began a conversation with Mrs. Wang with a view to pacifying her and the other ladies. At first she was frantic and would listen to nothing, but gradually she became more reasonable.

Here it is necessary to digress slightly to say a little about Doyle, for otherwise his interpretation of the conversation would appear eccentric.

Doyle was a man who had been educated for a missionary, had mastered the Chinese language solely with that object, and had commenced his duties in China. He was a good fellow on the whole, but a very peculiar one, and his stories savored strongly of the Munchausen school. Every one in China knew Doyle and his stories. But the peculiarity with which we have to deal was somewhat amusing. In interpreting or relating any conversation, he invariably represented everyone as prefacing sentences with "Look here," and it was droll to hear him invest everybody with this his idiosyncrasy. As, for instance, in our conversation with this lady, which ran thus:

"Now, Doyle, tell her not to be afraid, for she shall not be molested in any way."

After a deal of talking he manages to make her understand this, but she evidently does not believe a word of it, and so we ask Doyle what she says.

"O," he replies, "she says 'Look here; why do you come here, you red-haired barbarians? You will not dare to touch me, the wife of his Excellency Wang. There are my handmaidens, take them if you will, but immediately quit my centre-chamber.'

"And so then," said Doyle, "I replied, 'Look here: we respect your ladyship's most excellent greatness, and we will do nothing that shall be unpleasant to you or to your ladies.'"

"Well, Doyle, and then?"

"Look here," he answered. "She is still very abusive, for this is what she said to me in reply: 'Look here, you white-faced dog, who alone appear to understand the flowery language. Say, what further insult will you offer me? Tell me where is my Lord Wang? Have you killed him, or do you reserve him for the tseen tsce?'" This signifies the "thousand cuttings," the mode of executing state criminals. They are tied to the stakes, and slowly hacked to pieces; the executioners contriving, with horrible ingenuity, to defer the fatal stroke as long as possible.

"And so," he continued, "I said to her, 'Look here; we do not fight with pretty women, and as for Wang, he has deserted you and escaped; but you will doubtless see him before the end of this moon.'"

This conversation for some time, much in the same strain, but occasionally interrupted by a prolonged howl from the old women in the corner.

Having thus endeavored, with but little success, to reassure these unhappy ladies, we returned and attended to our other prisoners. They were huddled together on the quarter-deck, vainly trying to keep themselves warm, for the night wind was very cold. At first they were in a great state of terror, but now seemed more resigned to the horrible fate that they had no doubt was to await them.

Sails were brought to cover them, but these they vigorously rejected, thinking that we meant to smother them. With great difficulty, and to their vast astonishment, they were made to understand that our only object was to make them comfortable, and not to torture them. Treatment such as this they had never heard of captives receiving; still less could they believe it possible at the hands of the Western devils, who are naturally considered to be seven times more malignant than devils are wont to be. When at last they did understand our motives, it was pleasant to see how gratefully they stowed themselves away under the sails.

I then sent for a stiff glass of grog and offered it to them telling them that it was the "yang shoo," the foreign wine. Until they saw me taste it no one would touch it, and then one ventured. He was delighted; his little black eyes twinkled and opened wide with astonishment. The glass was passed round, and they all said "It is good, it is good; his Foreign Excellency's wine is very good."

About this time a boat was seen approaching through the darkness. The sentries hailed, and the men answered, according to Doyle, "Look here; we want to come alongside; we have something of importance to communicate." Three or four miserable-looking Chinamen came on board, and this is Doyle's account of his conversation with them.

"'Look here,' said I; 'what do you want?'

"And they said, 'Look here, we are the men who took the foreigner's junk, and we have come to give ourselves up to you in order that the general's vessel may be released.'

"'Look here,' I replied; 'you are not the men. I don't believe a word you have said. Why have you thus endeavored to deceive his Foreign Excellency?'

"'O, great teacher, be not too angry with us,' they answered. 'For look here; we are not indeed the men who stole the junk. We are simply poor rice-planters who live on yonder bank, and the Braves came to us and said, Look here; if you will not go on board that barbarian ship we will kill you and your wives and children; and burn your farms and lay waste your fields. And so we took counsel together amongst ourselves, and we said, look here; it will be better for us to trust ourselves in the hands of the chiefs of the great English nation, for they can but take our lives; and if we refuse to go our wives and children will be murdered too. Now, therefore, we beseech you, O ever-to-be-venerated teacher, ask his Foreign Excellency not to deal too hardly with us.'

"And so I said, 'Why, look here; as you certainly are not the men who took the junk, you may go. When you get on shore go to the chiefs of the Braves, and say to them, Look here; these foreigners are wise beyond measure, their eyes are as hawks' eyes, and it is useless to practice deceits. Send off no more false messengers, for it will avail you nothing.'"

These poor fellows were overjoyed at their escape. The Braves could hardly have been a blessing to them. In about an hour some more men came with the very same story. They were soon found out, and allowed to return with a similar message. During the night a third came, with a like result; this time, however, the story had been varied a little.

On the following morning a fighting-boat was coming down the river to join the fleet. It was determined to intercept her. With this object we weighed anchor and stood in close to the mouth of the creek, where we stopped, and manned and armed boats. We remained close alongside hidden by the gunboat, until the report of one of her howitzers gave us the signal to start. The fighting junk then being within easy distance, we were quickly alongside her, and without much difficulty we made ourselves masters of the vessel. She was brought alongside, her crew transferred, and a search of the vessel was made. We were in luck again, for there was half a million of copper cash on board. This, it appeared, was for the pay of the army.

We then returned to Hankow with our prizes in tow, and restored the merchants' junk to her owners; the other two, with the prisoners, we kept for about a week.

Every morning and evening we visited the ladies to ask if they wanted anything. At first they were as wild as possible, and Mrs. Wang used frequently to start up and call out in a commanding tone, "Ho, there, guards; take away these barbarians!" but by degrees they got tamer, and a circumstance occurred which made us all great friends. After this we used to supply her with wine, lend her illustrated books, and amuse her with our epaulettes, gold lace, swords, and everything else that we could think of.

The circumstance to which I have alluded was this. One day the ladies complained that they were very unwell. It seemed that since their lord and master had deserted, the servants all refused to work, and the ladies could get nothing cooked, and they were consequently in a very low condition simply from want of food. This deficiency of course was speedily remedied, and then we set ourselves to find out all the circumstances of the case. The servants evidently thought that they would extort large sums of money in this way from the ladies. They were mistaken, however. The matter was summarily disposed of by sending for them and explaining to them that in consequence of their gross misbehavior we had determined on beheading them all.

It astonished us no little to see their calm resignation when they received their sentence. They simply said, "Well, if you will, you must!" or something of that sort. I never could have believed their stoicism to be possible, and should always have thought that they doubted the sincerity of our purpose, had I not seen their frantic joy when they were told that they would be allowed another chance of life, provided they returned to their duties; they were as though they had veritably arisen from the dead, and we had been the authors of the change. Suffice it to say that their gratitude knew no bounds and there were no more complaints.

When it was reported that the men who were implicated in the junk's seizure had been delivered up and punished, the two Imperial vessels and their crews were released.

Our men had fraternized very considerably with their Celestial brother-sailors—so much so, indeed, that on leaving the ship they were so drunk that their efforts to row their vessels to the land were truly ridiculous.

We parted from the ladies with much regret, for I, for one, had learned the truth of the old adage, "Eum capimus capimur." They took with them many mementos of their captivity amongst the fierce Western barbarians, and with other things, I hope, the lesson that the "foreign Devil" is not so black as he is painted.

THE GRAY MONK.

BY ETTA W. PIERCE.

O, the abbey's towers rose straight and tall,
And the lands of the abbey were fair to see,
And the gray monk sat by the abbey's wall,
With cowl on head and hook on knee.
Thick in the ivy the dewdrops shone,
And the eyes of the violets brimmed with tears,
Where he sat alone, on a mossy stone—
A pious father, and full of years.

With sandalled feet and shaven crown—
Pious and holy in deed and word:
Frosty and thin his beard swept down
To his knotted girdle of hempen cord;
And the wall-flower there, and the ivy shook
Their dew upon him in fitful fall,
And the gray monk ruffled his holy hook,
And looked to the cross on the carven wall.

A bird flew out of the far blue west,
And perched him high on the coping-stone—
A little bird, with a shining breast,
And a song that thrilled through marrow and bone.
He perched on the stone all wrinkled and bare,
Mother of Jesus, guard us well!
For what he sang to the gray monk there,
The monk and the angels alone can tell!

It was not prayer in cloister dim,
Nor mass at the midnight altars heard—
Solemn matin nor vesper hymn,
That stirred in the note of that stranger bird;
But a voice that smote the olive-tree
Pallid and dumb by the postern door,
And the hook slipped down from the father's knee,
And he murmured and muttered an ave o'er.

Then the song of the bird pierced into his soul,
And seized, like a spell, on the gray monk's brain—
Prayer, and penance, and priestly stole
The passed, and he walked with his youth again;
No monk, I trow, but a warrior tried,
Of lordly favor and high degree—
In bower of maiden and court of pride,
Far famed as the flower of chivalry.

He dreamed of his father's knightly hall,
The wolf-hounds haying at break of day,
Banner that dropped on castle wall,
And spears and spearmen in war array;
He rode in the lists of Fame and Love,
He looked again on their guerdons won—
A fleur de lis and a lady's glove,
And still the little brown bird sang on.

He dreamed of fields where the bravest die,
The broken lance and the captive train,
Champing charger and trumpet cry,
And the gaunt wolf prowling upon the slain;
And the gray monk clasped his holy book,
For his heart was stirred to a dirge's roll,
But the bird sang on till the faint air shook—
You'd have sworn 'twas a wail for a parting soul!

"O, youth was folly, and love a snare,
And glory," sighed he, "an empty name;
And the tapers shine on the altar where
Repose the arms of my knightly fame—
Cross, and hauberk, and hauner riven,
The sword of battles, the princely crest,
But the only cross could reach the heaven—
Jesu Maria! give us rest!"

"Rest!" said the ivy, with a sigh,
Softly the wall-flower answered, "Rest!"
And the shade of the craven cross on high,
Sunk, like a sign, on the gray monk's breast.
"Rest," breathed the violet from her cell;
"Rest," moaned the olive-tree, old and gray;
"Rest," grieved the wind, like a passing bell,
"Rest," sang the bird, as he flew away.

Slowly the red sun drank the dew
From the ivy, climbing the abbey's wall;
And far and high through the welkin blue,
The bells of the abbey loudly call;
And the pilgrim lingers, weary and lone,
To tell his beads at the abbey's door,
But the bird has gone from the coping-stone,
And the monk of St. Francis will pray no more!

O, the ring-dove nesteth in greenwood tree,
The lark still sings in the springing corn;
And the lands of the abbey are fair to see,
But never, never since that far morn,
Hath mortal heard such a roundelay,
Nor seen, alack! with waking eyes,
That little brown bird who bore away
The soul of the monk to paradise!

They have a clock at Greenwich which deserves to "strike" if any clock ever did. It does no end of work. It maintains various clocks in perfect sympathy with itself, regulates clocks in London, sends signals through Britain, drops the Deal time-ball, fires guns at Newcastle and Shields, and puts communication in such a state that the Greenwich observer can receive automatic reports of the going of distant clocks as he may desire.

Don't send for an adviser with the mere view of being confirmed in your own opinion. You might as well send for a doctor, and prescribe to him what medicines he ought to order.

RESURRECTING.

BY JOHN QUILL.

THE doctor sat in his chair in front of the fire, in the bar-room of the Phœnix Hotel, in Oldcastle, Delaware. The doctor was taking an adult's dose of a tonic which an apothecary behind the counter had mixed for him, and he lay back in his chair, with his feet elevated on the top of the fireplace, as if to get himself out of a dead perpendicular, and give the fluid a chance to go down more slowly, so that he could get his money's worth of enjoyment out of it.

"I never told you," said he, "about my resurrecting experience, did I?"

"No, he never had. Everybody knew about his exploits in putting people under ground, but no one had ever heard of his raising anybody.

"Well, you observe," said he, "that I was at one time a medical student in a Philadelphia college. I don't know why I ever became a medical student, for, mark you, I never bore any particular grudge against the human race. I never wanted to thin out the population, you might say. But a man must have a profession, and doctoring, like soldiering, is legalized slaughter. There is no actual crime about it, you observe.

"Well, I got so, at last, that I was actually fond of the business. I knew all about my fellow men's interior, and I fully recognized the fact that every man carries around with him about nine thousand parts, with just that many five-cornered Latin names. He is a fleshy embodiment of the dead languages, you may say. But this made no difference to me, mark you; I learned them all, and I was never happy unless I was bleeding a man, or sawing off his leg, or cutting chunks out of him, you observe.

"But dissecting was my best hold. There was nothing I cared for in this life, more than to get over some disinterred remains, with a chance to hack them up with a cross-saw. That, you may say, was the solace of my existence.

"But once, by some unfortunate blunder, we ran out of subjects, and I agreed with two other fellows that it manifestly devolved on us to go on a body-snatching expedition, immediately. The path of duty, you may say, led direct to a graveyard.

"So we hired a hack-driver to whom we disclosed our plans, and led him to believe that there would be large pecuniary results arising from his participation in the transaction, although, mark you, it was expressly stipulated that there was to be at least one dead-head passenger on the back trip.

"At twelve o'clock that night, precisely, the hack drove up to the door, and we placed therein a choice collection of spades, pick-axes and crowbars, to the astonishment of our landlady, who, after a brief conversation with us in the entry, went to bed laboring under the somewhat erroneous impression that we were going up into Schuylkill county to dig a canal, you observe.

"The driver having stated that he was familiar with the route to the said burying ground, the night being so dark that the outside of the hack looked almost as white as snow, you may say, we gave no thought as to time, locality or space, but let the gentle Jehu follow his own sweet will and the railroad track.

"After about an hour's drive, the hack stopped, and we got out. Through the darkness we could see gravestones and monuments all around us, as thick as you please. We climbed over an iron railing, which struck me as being unsually low, you observe, for a cemetery, and then after carefully lifting the tools into the graveyard, we felt around to see if we could find any fresh earth, which I knew must be very near where we were.

"Directly we got our hands on some that seemed to have been recently upturned, and upon examination, the headstone was found to be entirely new. This, then, you may say, was the coveted spot.

"We began digging, and were more than ever convinced that we had struck the right place. The soil was loose and gravelly, and gave way easily. Well, we dug, and dug, and dug We dug for an hour, and excavated a hole, mark you, that would have served as a cellar for an ordinary four-story house; but we couldn't find the body. But we knew it must be there, you observe, and so we renewed our efforts.

"We dug for an hour and a half longer until I was so wet with perspiration, you may say, that you could have expressed about four gallons of agua puru out of my shirt.

"But we kept on digging, mark you, and after a while, we came to water. It flowed in on us so fast, you observe, that I had an indistinct idea that we must have struck the point of a pickaxe through some stray street main or other, that was wandering around there by chance. But I bailed her out while the others dug, not without some fears, mark you, that the next thing we struck might be oil. But still we found no corpse.

"It did seem singular, but perseverance was one of our strong points, and we had pretty much concluded, you may say, that we were going to resurrect those remains that night, or excavate the whole graveyard, if the shovels only held out; and so we kept on digging.

"I suppose you've heard that there are subterranean fires in the centre of the earth, haven't you? Well, mark you, as we dug down we became momentarily conscious of an increase of temperature; but we paid no attention to it, you observe, for we must snatch that body or die. That, you may say, was fixed, even if we went clear through to China, and I am under the impression that we nearly did; for I distinctly remember hearing a few words in an unknown tongue, and I think I smelt a faint perfume of tea.

"But that's neither here nor there. While we were digging, one of my companions went up into the graveyard to reconnoitre—to ascertain, you may say, whether there was any one prowling around. It was getting to be daylight very fast, and presently he came to the mouth of the hole, and with a saddened voice, hollered down:

"'Say, boys, I guess you might as well come up.'

"'What for?' said we, 'is anybody about?'

"'No,' said he, 'no, but I guess you'd better come up.' And his voice fell as he spoke. 'Tain't no use digging there any longer; just come up and see if it is.'

"So we laid down the tools and went up to see if it was, you may say, and mark you, do you know that I came near fainting away when I got out? Yes sir; for amputate my leg and dose me with anti-bilious pills if we hadn't been digging all night in a stone-cutter's yard, and there wasn't any cemetery within five miles of us! That's so. There it was, an old marble yard with all the bran new stony angels, and one thing and another laying round, and nary a sepulchre anywhere about, only a hole deep enough to make the fortune of an oil company, although there were no 'indications,' not of the kind we wanted, anyway. Nobody had anything to say for, mark you, the occasion was too solemn and to serious for language. And the hack driver, you observe, was gone. He had his fingers on his cash before he started out, and had very likely been gone a week, you may say.

"So we walked home, and you know I never went ressurrecting again, for I never seemed to have much luck, you observe. Thank you, I'll take mine cold, with sugar." And the doctor heaved a sigh as the bar-tender took his tumbler and mixed him another dose of tonic.

THE GREAT EASTERN A SKELETON SHIP.

A WRITER in an English paper gives the following account of a singular superstition connected with the Great Eastern:

She is a ship with two cases, or skins, as they are called—that is, she is almost like one ship fitted inside another. Between the inner and outer skin workmen can crawl for repairs. Dreadfully dark and sepulchral, of course it is in there, for, from the nature of the space, the workmen must be completely closed in, excepting at the spot at which he enters. Very few smiths or shipwrights would care to work in there alone, for two terrible specters are supposed to haunt the place. Almost all the men who were engaged in the construction of the vessel believed that somewhere there in the darkness and thick air lie two skeletons, which can never be found until the vessel is broken up. These are the remains of a smith and his riveter, the latter being a lad. During the construction of the vessel these two worked all through the week, keeping full time, and their work lay between the skins. The smith was an elderly man, of a moody temper, who made no friends, and was not popular with his mates.

No one saw him leaving his work—no-body was interested about him. But one pay-day both he and his lad failed to appear at the pay table to draw their money. They never were heard of more by any one who worked on the Great Eastern. Of course their absence had been noticed by the time-keeper, and other officials; but the missing men being, as I have said unpopular with their comrades, there had been very little inquiry about them, until it was found that their money was not claimed. It was then soon noted that the last time they had been seen they were at work in the "case" of the ship, and before long it became a fixed notion that by a fall, or by the effect of some vapor, the two had been killed, or stunned until closed in; and all the host of men who worked at the great ship believed that somewhere in the vast hulk there lay two skeletons, which, for some reason, could never be found; the prosaic idea that the old fellow and his helper had left without warning, for a better job, finding, of course, no favor.

Lost wealth may be regained by a course of industry, the wreck of health may be repaired by temperance, forgotten knowledge restored by study, alienated friendship soothing into forgivness, even forfeited reputation won back by penitence and virtue. But who ever again looked upon his vanished hours—recalled his slighted years, and stamped them with wisdom—or effaced from heaven's record the fearful blot of a waisted life.

An army, like water, stagnates by rest, and is kept fresh by motion.

Good words and good deeds are the rent we owe for the air we breathe.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, AUGUST 24, 1867.

POLITICIANS AND THE PEOPLE.

THE independent candidate for the position of Joint Senator to represent the city and county of San Francisco in the State Legislature, has recently issued a pamphlet, containing his reply to the "National Republican County Convention," together with his views on a number of the political questions of the day. No man can read the pamphlet without coming to the conclusion that the writer, is a most original and extraordinary specimen of a politician, for these days, if indeed he can properly be called a politician at all, in the sense in which the word is now popularly used. With every subject he touches upon, he deals in the most direct and fearless style. He has no evasions, ambiguities, or qualifications, and seems to aim simply at making himself clearly understood, in the fewest words possible. Very properly indeed, may he style himself the "independent" candidate, for he presents himself with the air of man who demands the office, because he conceives it to be right and fitting that he should have it, and not at all as if he were soliciting a favor. He assumes the tone of one who desires to serve the public for their own good, and not for his own profit or preferment. He acknowledges allegiance to no party, declines to have anything to do with the politicians, and makes his appeal directly to the people.

"It has always struck me as reasonable," he says, "that while parties, factions, and schemers have their candidates, THE PEOPLE should have at least one representative in the legislature—one member who acknowledges no political allegiance but to his country—no rule or motive of action but the public good." To the Convention that required him to endorse its string of nineteen resolutions, as the necessary condition of receiving its nomination, he says that he does not recognize them as a party, but only as a portion of the voters to whom he had adressed himself, adding with a certain touch of quaint humor; "I cannot accept your hospitable request that I shall occupy a seat on your platform, but wishing to cultivate your acquaintance, I invite you to stand upon mine." "Patriotism," declares this sturdy and unflattering candidate, "consists in the love of country, not the love of office; in devotion to the public goods, not the good of a party." In regard to the nineteen resolution, he boldly says, some of them meet my approval, and some do not, while others refer to subjects upon which I shall not at present decide, much less announce what my course will be." This is a kind of language long disused by political aspirants, and it carried us back to the earlier days of the Republic. Franklin, or Hancock might have talked like that, but to the ears of this generation it seem as old fashioned as the knee breeches and buckled shoes of the Knickerbocker era. When he comes to speak of the fifth resolution—the one which proposes to limit the hours of labor by law, the "independent" candidate says:

"I do not know what this resolution means. If its meaning is, that, as a general rule, every freeman shall work as many and as few hours, and for such wages as he has a mind to, or as may be agreed between him and his employer, I concur. If it means that any man shall be deprived of his liberty by law, or by any association or council, I give no assent to any such palpable violation of constitutional, as well as natural liberty, right and justice. This resolution is akin to your fifteenth, which has been adopted substantially by other political parties. The proposition is calculated to benefit laboring men; it can only deceive them. Laboring men, who have been so recently sold and so often sold before by politicians should not trust too much to such clap-trap."

In commenting upon the tenth resolution, which asserts that the action of the late Union County Committees of San Francisco and Sacramento, by which Democrats were allowed to take part in Union primary election, was a fraud upon the Union voters of this State, and disgraceful to all who were concerned therein, and that nominations obtained by such means have no binding obligation upon any member of the Union Party, the candidate characteristically says:

"I know nothing about the action of the Committees referred to, and am, therefore, not prepared to give my opinion whether it was or was not as bad as you have characterized it, but I am ready to believe anything you say on that subject. As to the binding force of nominations, I assert the absolute freedom of every voter when he comes to the polls, to cast his suffrage for any candidate according to the conviction he may then entertain of the candidate's fitness, without reference to nominations or the previous action of any body. I gave my opinion of primary elections, and the proposition to legalize them, in my letter addressed to the Independent Nominating Committee in 1863, and it remains unchanged. I then said 'the primary elections are among the latest inventions of politicians to cheat the people out of a free choice of their officers.' I advised the people to keep away from primaries, and go to the polls at every regular and lawful election, each voting for the best man, according to his own judgment. This course was observed in 1863, and all went well. You, however, this year, were emboldened to try your hand with the 'boys' at a game which requires that peculiar experience and skill which no honest man can ever possess. You were beaten. The old gambler stocked the cards on you, and you complained of 'foul play,' they flailed you most unmercifully, and you came away with 'sore heads.' I advise you to keep away from such company in future. As a remedy against all such frauds, I assert the omnipotent authority of the popular will—the absolute freedom of the voter to choose for himself for whom he will cast a vote. It is to vindicate this principle that I have become an independent candidate."

Here we are brought back to the fair ideal of founders of our government, in all its beautiful, but impracticable simplicity. It is a charming theory, that of the people dispensing with conventions, primaries, and all our modern political machinery, and going to the polls to choose the best and wisest of their own number to govern them—a most delightful theory—but alas! we fear that it is one too poetically beautiful ever to be realized in practice. It belongs to Plato's Republic, or Sir Thomas Moore's "Utophia," was no more than a theory.

A JOURNALISTIC MONOPOLIST.

THE New York Citizen stated in a late issue, that Bennett, of the Herald, has determined to start a new monthly, an illustrated weekly, a Sunday paper, with all the popular features appropriate to such a sheet, and a one cent daily. The last of this series of enterprises, the cheap daily, has already been commenced, and several numbers are before us. It is called the Evening Telegram, is about the size of the Dramatic Chronicle of this city, and is entirely filled with news and well selected reading matter, no advertisements being published. The department of city news is particularly full and complete up to the hour of the several editions going to press; the first edition is published at twelve o'clock, the second at three P. M., and the third at five P. M. In addition to the enterprises above mentioned, it is seriously reported that the editor of the Herald thinks of commencing a purely religious paper on a more comprehensive plan, and combining more literary and scholary ability than any other journal of the kind now published. If, as is popularly supposed, the Independent is the best religious organ in the country, we think it will be easy for Mr. Bennett to monopolize the field. The sentimental and conceited Tilton would be no match for mephistopheles, backed by his thirty years' experience, and his vast capital.

The Citizen professes a degree of sympathetic alarm for the fate of the "weaker brethren" of the periodical press, when all these enterprises shall have been inaugurated; and, in fact, the "small fry" may well be justified in anticipating with dread the necessity of sustaining a competition with so formidable a rival.

CHARLES WARREN STODDARD'S POEMS.—The Call yesterday published a criticism of the volume of poems by Charles Warren Stoddard, which is shortly to be published by A. Roman & Co. We don't quite approve of the Call dabbling in literary matters, we, however, have but little fault to find with the quality of this rather premature criticism. We have received a copy of this work, but shall defer any critical notice of it until it is published. The first edition is for subscribers (and THE CALIFORNIAN) only. The general public must wait. The majority of the poems contained in this volume appeared originally in this paper.

MR. EDMUND YATES, author of "Black Sheep," published some months since in THE CALIFORNIAN, and lately connected with the Temple Bar, is announced as the editor of the new London monthly, Tinsley's Magazine. The editor will contribute to the opening number a story entitled "The Rock Ahead;" and Dr. W. H. Russel will favor the reader with the often-promised "Adventures of Dr. Brady."

A FAIR HIT.

THE first notice of Mark Twain's "Jumping Frog" that appeared in this journal, contains an allusion to Mr. Webb, "editor" of the volume, and to the necessity and value of of his editorial services, which was certainly rather ungracious under the circumstances, and which we regetted upon reflection. In the light of the following explanation of the services actually rendered by Mr. Webb, which we find in the New York Citizen, we feel constrained to admit that our comment was not only ungracious, but unjust:

"The San Francisco Californian thinks that Mr. C. H. Webb's preface to the 'Jumping Frog' edited and published by him—though the Californian calls it 'Mark Twain's elegant volume'— is 'unnecessary to introduce the author to a Californian public.' Perhaps to a Californian public, but certainly not to the American public. And it must be borne in mind that books are not specially published for the Californian public, that public being the poorest in the world for buying books. Of its 'favorite and popular humorist' it called for only two hundred copies! 'Mark Twain' was in reality very little known in this parish, outside of a newspaper few, until the appearance of this volume. His 'book' in the form in which he had prepared it, was refused on all sides. Mr. Webb undertook to publish it mainly to introduce his friend to the public of this coast, and insure him an audience as a lecturer. With that view, the preface or 'advertisement' was written, and certainly Mr. 'Twain' is very much indebted to 'John Paul' for his skill displayed in editing, the taste with which the volume is gotten up, and the 'prefatory advertisement.' Especially for the latter, since 'John Paul' therein stretches the truth to say that his author never descends to coarseness, when the reverse is essentially true. What the book would have been without judicious excision, the reader can very well judge. As it is, Mr. Webb incurred the expense and assumed the risk—and the book has not paid.

The Californian, which Mr. Webb founded and conducted to a success, omitting all mention of him as publisher and credit for the really handsome volume, turns round and takes an ill-natured shy at him for introducing its 'popular and favorite humorist' to a strange public, with a few words of somewhat extravagant praise. Truly, the Republic of Letters is ungrateful—that of California particularly so."

Though we have thought it proper to give the explanation, or rather the rebuke, of Mr. Webb's champion in his own words, and though we are not disposed to take exception to any part of it on our own account, we cannot say that we quite like its tone and spirit toward "Mark" himself. We do not remember anything that appears to us like "extravagant praise," in Mr. Webb's introduction of his friend to the "strange public." As to the alleged "coarseness," of the Californian humorist, that is a question, the decision of which would depend a great deal upon definitions, and might ultimately resolve itself into a question of taste. The canons by which it is to be decided, are as unsettled and confused, as those by which it was recently sought to test the morality of Mr. Swinburne's poems. We know of no satisfactory dogmas by which questions of this kind can be set at rest. So far as our own taste is concerned, while recognizing that "Mark Twain's" humor is of quite a different strain from Frank Bret Harte's for instance, we think we could find a better and more accurate term than "coarse" by which to characterize it. Indeed, such are the resources of the English language that we even believe that a tolerably discriminating notice of "Miles O'Reilly" himself, as a humorist, might be written without pressing the objectionable adjective into the service. "What the book would have been without judicious excision," says the Citizen, "the reader can very well judge." How the reader is to judge what the book would have been without excision, or how he is to judge whether the excision was "judicious," in the absence of any knowledge of the matter which was removed by that surgical operation, we profess to be quite at a loss to understand. These remarks are not made with any wish to disparage the value of the services rendered by "John Paul" in editing his friend's book; much less are they prompted by any feeling of soreness resulting from the perfectly fair hit we have ourselves received. The only feature in the Citizen's mode of referring to the matter that impresses us disagreeably, is the somewhat patronizing attitude in which it places Mr. Webb with reference to his friend, an attitude which we are quite sure Mr. Webb himself would be the last to assume.

THE "GREAT REPUBLIC."—This fine steamer will leave for China on September 3d. She has accomodations for 1,000 passengers. The Great Republic is one of the largest steamers afloat. Her tonnage is 3,882 by government measurement, 5,000 by carpenter's measurement. Her cargo capacity is 2,000 tons. She is commanded by Captain Seth Doane.

THE CULINARY UNIVERSITY.

BY PRENTICE MULFORD alias "DOGBERRY."

THE school of cookery inangurated by Professor B——, in New York, is another evidence of the progress of the age. In the pursuit of knowledge I invaded the establishment. I rung at the front door. A fresh looking girl appeared bearing a subdued smell of onions. Explaining the object of my visit, she led the way to the lecture room where the Professor himself was at that moment speaking, the subject being "True Gastronomical Taste."

"Young ladies," said he, "never marry a man until you know what he eats. Never marry a man until you have seen him eat. Beware of the man without true gastronomical taste. Beware of him who affects to scorn delicate dishes, who eats mechanically, not knowing whether he is incorporating into his system Chicken fricasee á la Tom Paine, or saw dust; and who prates loudly of the virtues of pork, beans, cabbage and corned beef, patronized by his ancestors. An elegant and refined appetite indicates a similar refinement of the intellect, and the effect of coarse and badly prepared food affects not only the stomach, but the mentality. Never marry a man who bolts his food. Rapid mastication is gastronomical wickedness. The sentiment of properly prepared viands can only be realized by slow eaters. Want of correct taste in the choice, preparation and disposition of food also affects the bodily contour and the features. It is one of the chief causes of wrinkles and corpulency. Heaven grant, young ladies, that your pure and unsullied spirits may never be buried in undue and unproportionate masses of lymphatic matter."

At that moment a tremulons explosion was heard in the lower regions of the establishment, startling the class and shaking the whole building. The professor sat unmoved. The young ladies were about rushing to the scene of disaster.

"Order!" shouted the professor, "the boiler of the left range has probably collapsed. I expected it. It was left in charge of a culinary undeveloped young woman from Kansas, who never saw a stove before in her life."

It was true. In a few seconds the door opened and a cortege entered bearing the unfortunate young woman from Kansas, terribly scalded. "You have now young ladies, said the Professor, a practical example of the evil consequences of culinary neglect. I have repeatedly cautioned this young woman against allowing the water in her boiler to get so low. Box her up and send her home. We are here to learn the grand art of the cuisine, and learned it must be, even at the expense of life itself, if neccessary. Class in Boiling step forward. Miss Greely, you may take the class in boiling to the boiling room, and boil them—no, exercise them in boiling. Miss General Grant, allow me to judge of your proficiency in peeling potatoes."

Miss General Grant stepped forward and producing one of the nubbiest, crookedest potatoes I ever beheld, from her apron pocket, peeled it apparently in a most dexterous manner.

The professor examined it with a glass.

"There is the fifteenth part of a square inch of skin left in two eyes of this potatoe. Miss Grant, this will never do You will practice during the whole of next week in the potato department. Persevere, my dear young lady. Emulate the great and crowing virtue of your illustrious father."

Miss Grant bowed and retired, remarking that she "was determined to succeed in peeling potatoes though she fought it out on that line all Winter."

The Professor went on with his orders: "Miss Bennet may shell the peas. Miss Halleck will take charge of the turnip department. The class in frying will step forward."

The class in frying ranged themselves in front of the Professor, each one bearing frying-pan in hand.

"Miss Beecher," said he, "your frying-pan wants scouring. It is a disgrace to humanity—and, in its present sullied and blackened condition, reflects no credit on yourself and eloquent father. You may now all proceed to the frying-room, and see what justice you can do to sausages. Upon the poorest cookess will be imposed the penalty of eating her own sausage. Miss Stanton, what are the compouent parts of a genuine sausage?"

"Dogs, cats, horses——"

The Professor actually screeched. "Miss Stanton," said he, "your ignorance, after the opportunities afforded you, is lamentable and inexcusable. Is this the place for the retention of such old-fashioned and vulgar ideas? Consider your illustrious father. Go to the foot."

Miss Stanton and her frying-pan went slowly and sadly to the foot.

"Miss Theodore Tilton, can you answer that question?" asked the Professor.

"A sausage," rattled Miss T. Tilton, glibly, "is a compendium and combination in a parchment case of all the inhabitants of Noah's ark, save and except Noah, or Noah's descendants. No links have as yet been discovered by which we can trace out the manner of their origination, owing to the mysterious and impentrable silence maintained on the subject by poundmasters et id omne genus."

"Talented young woman, that," remarked the Professor, sotto voce. "She has expressed to me an unbending determination to devote her whole life to the investigation of the origin of the sausage, and thus, if successful, perpetuate and rival the fame of her illustrious father. You may go to the head, Miss T. Tilton."

Miss T. Tilton, the future Minerva in the world of sanges, and her frying pan strode triumphantly to the head. "The class may now retire and fry," said he. The class went and fried.

"Beginners in soup!" he shouted through a tube. The beginners came in, each bearing a kettle of soup. Taking a spoon from his breast pocket, the Professor marched along inspectiug, tasting, and screwing up his countenance into expressions indicative of various degrees of disgust. Suddenly, he struck an attitude before a confused and blushing girl. He spoke. "Miss Secretary Wells, an article like this is not only a disgrace to your venerable father, but its manufacture and consequent production on the part of any woman who has assumed the duties of a wife would, in these days of connubial freedom, afford good and sufficient grounds for granting a divorce on application from any unfortunate and outraged husband. Miss Secretary Wells, I am unwillingly compelled to inflict upon you condign and merited punishment. You must yourself consume this soup, and may Providence have mercy on your stomach. The class in soup is dismissed. Recollect, simmer—no boiling allowed—skim carefully, and tremble when you put in salt. Broilers!"

The class in broiling came in with wire griddles. An excited young lady rushed frantically around among her companions, exclaiming in a loud whisper, "Who, on earth has carried off my liver? I had it this morning hanging up in the buttry."

There seemed to be much confusion in this class, and other exclamations were heard, such as—

"Who's got my steak?" "Where's those kidneys I had this morning?" "You stole my brains!" "You never had any!" "You lie!"

"Order!" thundered the Professor. "If I ever again hear such a disturbance in this broiling class, I'll set them to skinning cattle for the next six weeks. Miss Johnson, what is the surest indication of civilized barbarism?"

"Frying beef steak in lard," replied Miss Johnson.

"And how should a taste for such a culinary monstrosity be treated by society?" asked he.

"It should be promptly vetoed," said Miss Johnson.

"She takes after her illustrious father," murmured the Professor. The class in broiling then betook themselves to their labors.

The autocrat of these embryo cooks conducted me through the establishment. He showed me one apartment in which were confined four young ladies. "These," said he, "are the daughters of wealthy California miners, placed on a strict diet. We cannot allow them the least participation in culinary operations until a taste contracted in that wild land for pork, beans, and a leathery substance boiled in grease, called beef, is entirely annihilated. I do not even allow them to associate with the other young ladies until the influence communicated to their organizations by such an outrage on the human stomach divine, is entirely extirpated. But come and witness the exercises of the senior class.

Then we went into a magnficently furnished room where two elegantly dressed young ladies, on a raised platform containing the necessary apparatus, performed several intricate and complicated pieces of cookery. Seated in a chair, one of them dexterously manipulated the manufacture of a Damon fromage á la Chantilly, arranged Bouches de chien á la Pompadour while, with her toes, she performed one of Mendelsshon's most difficult pieces.

The other young person, while dancing a pas seul, and singing in basso profundo the aria from Faust, "O Ciel", turned out fourty patties á la Reine and, twenty-two Perigord Truffles.

OCCIDENTALS.—Turn Verin Hall was crowded on Tuesday evening, when the Occideutal Club gave an entertainment. Hamlet was played with C. M. Ciprico in the title role. He played the part fairly for an amateur. S. S. Roberts deserves credit for the impressive manner in which he read the part of the "Ghost." Miss E. A. Pitts, as the "Queen," read and acted very well, and Mrs. E. M. Ludlum made a charming "Ophelia." It is not comfortable to see a play like Hamlet played by amateurs. Mr. Ciprico had evidently carefully studied the character of "Hamlet," and had every desire to do it justice, but did not succeed. His reading was generally too monotous and slow, and his gestures were stiff. The dance, which took place as soon as Hamlet was dispatched, was thoroughly enjoyed by all who participated in it

On Saturday, August 31st, G. M. Ciprico will be the recipient of a complimentary benefit at the Academy of Music, tendered him by the Occidental Club and many citizens of San Francisco. Mr. Ciprico has been indefatigable in his efforts to bring the theatrical entertainments of the Occidental Club as near to perfection as possible, and many admire his industry. Hamlet will be played with the same cast as when it was produced on Tuesday last at Turn Verein Hall.

ROSE AND THORN.

COME, kiss, and go,
Tears are in vain;
Love doth not grow
In storms of rain.

To meet and part
Is Fate's decree;
The fettered heart
Throbs itself free.

One pledge of wine,
One tress of hair,
And thine and mine
Are but as air.

The vow is naught,
Without the will;
The touch forgot
That does not thrill.

All bubbles blown
Are sure to burst;
We blew our own,
And know the worst.

Nor you, nor I,
Can make it Spring,
When snow doth fly,
And cold doth sting.

Then, smile and kiss;
The rose and thorn
Of grief and bliss,
Are equal born.

One last embrace;
No tear, nor sigh,
Should mark the place
Where Love doth lie.

He came in dew,
And went in flame;
Himself he slew,
Who is to blame?

EXTRA ROAR FROM THE "LION'S MOUTH."

Chinese Peculiarities.

Fitz-Smythe gave an account in Wednesday's Alta of the Chinese free school. He says of the scholars:

"In addition to intelligent countenances, they are plump, tall nnctions and muscular—peculiarities for which their race are noted."

We do not hold with the above statement. It is not a peculiarity of a Chinaman to be tall, stroug, fat and greasy. We have many native-born American citizens who are plumper, taller, "nnctuonser," and more muscular than any Mongolian dare to be. This sort of thing won't do just about election time. That Chinese article will probably lose Gorham a dozen votes.

A Very Funny Joke.

Mr. Upton winds up his letter from Paris, which appeared in last Monday's Alta, with the following exquisitely funny joke about the death of Maximilian:

"Juarez has, however, demonstrated one fact very conclusively—that persons with royal blood in their veins are not bullet proof."

This is very amusing and quite worthy of the paper in which it appears. The erroneous idea so prevalent in monarchical countries, that persons with royal blood in their veins are bullet-proof has been corrected by Juarez!

The Band of Hope.

We are glad to hear that the temperance movement is advancing among the children of San Francisco. No less than sixty children of ages ranging from five to thirteen years of age have pledged themselves to abstain from all intoxicating fluids. Drunkeness among the infants of this city was becoming so prevalent that it was high time steps were taken to prevent it. We trust that these infant teetotallers who form the Band of Hope will not, when they reach years of discretion, take to brandy cock-tails and mint juleps.

Cold Comfort for the Fenians.

Jeff Davis' late Niagara speech in which he hoped the British flag would forever wave over Canadian soil.

A Genuine Block-Head.

The amiable gentlemen named Block, who lately married a Miss Head, in Buffalo.

WOODWARD'S GARDEN—Additions are being constantly made to the already numerous attractions of these beautiful gardens. Hundreds of curiosities are to be seen in the museum, fine paintings and statuary on view in the art gallery, the conservatories are filled with rare plants and beautiful flowers, and the zoological collection is now very complete. A fine concert will in future be given every Saturday afternoon and sacred music will be performed on Sundays.

THE CITY GARDENS.—Chief among the many attractions offered at this pleasant spot, are the boats in which visitors row on the lake. The gardens are now gay with flowers, the birds and beasts have become quite comfortable in their new home, and each day some additional improvement is made. This afternoon a grand instrumental concert will be given as usual, and to-morrow a sacred concert will take place.

ANATOMICAL MUSEUM.—Important additions have been made to this splendid collection of models. Much instruction and amusement can be derived from a visit to this establishment. The Egyptian mummies are objects of interest to all visitors.

SCHELL, the artist, is likewise a punster. When, with some of his brethren, out sketching, one of the club proposed to remain and sketch another landscape, "Oh, no," said Schell, "let's ketch the ears."

THY KINGDOM COME.

Thy kingdom come.
I heard a seer cry; "The wilderness,
The solitary place.
Shall yet be glad for him, and he shall bless
(Thy kingdom come) with his revealed face
The forrest: they shall drop their precious gum,
And shed for Him their balm; and He shall yield
The grandeur of His speech to charm the field.

"Then all the soothed winds shall drop to listen,
(Thy kingdom come,)
Comforted waters waxen calm shall glisten
With bashful tremblement beneath His smile;
And Echo ever the while
Shall wake, and in her awful joy repeat,
The laughter of His lips—(Thy kingdom come);
And hills that sit apart shall be no longer dumb;
No, they shall shout and shout,
Raining their lovely loyalty along the dewy plain;
And valleys round about.

"And all the well-contented land, made sweet
With flowers she opened at His feet,
Shall answer; shout and make the welkin ring,
And tell it to the stars, shout, shout and sing;
Her cup being full to the brim,
Her poverty made rich with Him,

"Her yearnings satisfied to utmost sum—
Lift up they voice, O Earth, prepare thy song,
It shall not yet be long,
Lift up, O Earth, for He shall come again,
Thy Lord; and He shall reign, and He shall reign—
Thy kingdom come." JEAN INGELOW.

INHABITED PLANETS.

IN olden times the vanity of man placed our earth in the centre of the solar system, caused the sun, moon, and stars to revolve about it, looked upon it as the most important orb in creation, and boldly asserted that it was fixed in its place and devoid of motion. Since then the efforts of astronomers have overturned one by one these extraordinary notions, the results of superstition and imperfect observation.

At the present day, the science of astronomy has taught us to guide our ships; to construct our maps; to regulate time and divide the year; to calculate the coming of comets and eclipses, nay, even of shooting stars, the movement of the tides, the distances, volumes, and weights of the heavenly bodies, and those of the globe in which we live; and sundry other useful lessons which need not be mentioned here.

But, putting aside the practical results of the most ancient of the sciences, we love to dwell sometimes upon teachings of another kind, more apt to captivate our curiosity. After satisfying ourselves, for instance, that the sun is a great luminous globe, 1,407,187 times greater than the earth; that it forms the centre of our planetary system; that it turns upon its axis, and illuminates all the planets which revolve around it, to which it also radiates heat; that it is not fixed in space, but travels along with its hosts of planets, satellites, comets, and meteroids, toward some distant space in the midst of the universe; that it is nearly 115,000,000 miles from us;—after assuring ourselves of this, we are led to inquire more intimately into the nature of this wonderful orb; we endeavor to learn something of its physical constitution; we study minutely its surface, its bright portions and its spots, its great red protuberances. thousands of miles long, seen during an eclipse; we analyze the light it sends us; and we notice carefully the influence of its spots upon the movements of a magnetic needle, or upon the product of a wheat district.

Another consideration has not failed to excite our curiosity. It is not inhabited?

The ancients, having no idea whatever of the size and forms of the planets, could only speculate a little upon the sun and moon. On the latter they were fond of putting inhabitants, which the moders have so diligently taken off again, insisting that the moon has no atmosphere, etc., and therefore no living creatures. It is amusing to find Anaxagoras speaking of a lion which fell out of the moon into Peloponnesus, alluding, perhaps, to a great fall of meteoric stones,—a class of phehomena to which he afterwards devoted much attention. The ancient writers were out of the reach of more modern fanaticism; no one strove to contradict them; they excited no mediæval jealousies; they interferred with no doctrines. But it was rather different in the time of Copernicus and Galileo. When the latter began to give the world the benefit of his observations, he was, as everyone knows, most villanously persecuted.

Yet it was not the man, not the illustrious Tuscan, of whom his fellow citizens were justly proud, but his "principles" were attacked. Fancy the priest Ciampoli writing to Galileo, in February, 1615: "....Put a great reserve on what you say; for when you establish a certain resemblance between a terristrial globe and the lunar globe, another person immediately exaggerates it, and says you suppose that there are men inhabiting the moon; and this other person soon begins to inquire how they can possibly have descended from Adam, or come out of the ark of Noah, with no end of other extravaganees of which you have never dreamt!" The celebrated astronomer Gassendi, in much larer times, received a very similiar epistle from another theologian.

Now that we are more thoroughly acquainted with the planetary system revolving around the sun, and can compare the distances, volumes, movements, weight, etc., of the different members of this system, what do we discover? We find that our eart, magnificent as it is—with its volcanoes and hot-springs, its earthquakes, snow-peaked mountains and lovely valleys, its mountain torrents, cascades and wide rivers, its boundless ocean, its varied and beautiful vegetation intermingled with myriads of different animals—constitutes but a very secondary feature among the planets. It is neither the largest nor the smallest, the nearest to the sun, not the farthest away; neither the warmest nor the coldest, the lightest nor the heaviest; and if we find it teeming with life, we must necessarily suppose that life—the highest manifestation of nature's forces—exists in other plances also.

This question has no doubt given, in modern times, a great stimulus to astronomical inquiry, and to the physical investigation of the orbs which constitute our solar system. Several works have appeared concerning the inhabitability of the planets. Not long since we had in England the well-known controversy between Professor Whewell and Sir David Brewster, in the works Plurity of Worlds and More Worlds than One, which for a time excited much interest in this part of the world. An important work of the same kind has lately created some sensation in France. I allude to La Pluraleté des Mondes habités, by M. Camille Flammarion, of the Bureau des Longitudes, whose book, published in 1863, is now in its tenth French edition.

An astronomer by profession, one of the editors of the journal Cosmos, and for several years an active member of the Imperial Observatory, M. Flammarion has had every opportunity that he could desire for developing this interesting subject, and elucidating it, by the aid of the most recent discoveries in astronomy and physics. In the new edition of this work the arguments of the English philosophers are incorporated, together with copious notes from other sources bearing upon the same subject, and are carefully discussed. Devoting the first portion of his volume of the results of an extensive historical research, he next proceeds to the physical study of each planet in particular; then to the manifestation of life upon our globe, to the conditions to which life is submitted upon the earth, and to which it would be submitted, as far as we know, on the surface of other planets; and lastly, the author develops an ingenious theory, in which he endeavors to establish that the spiritual unity of the world is as necessary as its physical unity.

To any person tolerably devoid of prejudice, and slightly acquainted with the teachings of modern astronomy, it must appear absurd in the extreme to suppose that these magnificent worlds which revolve around the sun should not have been as highly endowed by the Creator as our little earth, a mere point in the universe, which constitutes so moderate a feature among them and quite as fanciful to imagine that our globe is for man the best possible of worlds.

One or two prodigious difficulties arise, however, when we wish to bring forward some palpable proof of the planets being in reality inhabited by creatures at all like ourselves. Not the slightest doubt can exist as to the possibility of this, as far as certain planets are concerned—more particularly Venus, Mars, and Mercury,—reasoning from the little we know of their physical properties, and their telescopic appearance, so similar to what our earth must appear viewed from one of them.

But if from planets we proceed to speculate upon their satellites, and from these to the sun itself, and to the comets and shooting stars, we find ourselves soon without a reasonable argument to stand upon. In the first place, our own satellite reveals no atmosphere,—unless, indeed, some observations made by Secchi a few years ago should be confirmed, according to which the moon has a slight atmosphere, through which penetrate the peaks of its high mountains. Jupiter and Saturn being very light planets, some astronomers have supposed that the former was nothing more than a vast globe of water; its inhabitants in this case would be of the aquatic order,—large whales, and so on. As to comets, who can say anything? But shooting stars, or rather meteoric stones, when they reach our earth, have been found to contain organic matter, either the remains or the beginning of life.

Doubtless many centuries will yet elaspse before the inhabitants of our planet—our own Cybele—can have any very positive proofs of the existence of living creatures on the other globes which travel in space; all we can say at present is, that such a fact is exceedingly probable. But as far as speculation—based upon well-ascertained scientific data, and upheld by sound philosphical reasoning—can go, M. Flammarion has conducted us in the work alluded to above, throughout which there reigns a soothing breath of natural and pure philosophy, inspired by deep admiration of the grandest works of the Creator.

M. Flammarion is the opinion that the spiritual and physical universe are one, and that the planets are the abodes of intelligence, more or less developed, we may suppose, according to their respective positions.

FEELING is a truer oracle than thought; hence women are oftener right than men.

EVENTIDE.

The day is well nigh spent; the shadows creep
Along my path; the light is fading fast;
Soon shall I close these weary eyes in sleep,
And life and all its toils be over past.

How peacefully the sun now sinks to rest—
My sun of life, so calm in its decline!
Like a tired child upon its mother's breast,
Saviour, I lay my aching head on thine;

And, clasping thy dear hand in bonndless trust,
Though night is gathering darkly o'er my way,
I know the morn will come when this frail dust
Shall wake to life immortal, endless day.

THE LATEST FROM THE SONG WRITERS.

BY THE "FAT CONTRIBUTOR."

THE man who "Dreampt I dwelt in Marble Halls" has opened a marble quarry there, and is doing a thriving business in getting out grave stones.

The man who sang "I am Lonely since my Mother Died" isn't quite so lonely now. The old man married again, and his step-mother makes it lively enough for him.

The author of "Life on the Ocean Wave" is gratifying his taste for the sea by tending saw-mill. He will be on the water.

The author of "Shells of Ocean" is in the clam business.

The one who wailed so plaintively, "Do they miss me at home?" was missed the other day, together with a neighbor's wife. He is missed by a wife and seven children.

The man who wrote "Five o'clock in the morning," found that no saloons were open at that early hour where he could get his bitters, so he lies abed rather later now.

The author of "Roll on, silver moon" has opened a ball alley. Silver moon can't roll on his alley without paying for it.

He who sang "I'd offer thee this hand of mine," has been sued for breach of promiso.

The author of "Old Arm-chair" is still in the furniture business.

The one who pleaded "Rock me to sleep, mother, rock me to sleep," has at length been gratified. His mother yielding to his repeated solicitations, picked up a rock and rocked him to sleep. He hasn't woke up yet.

The one who asked, "Who will care for mother now?" has finally concluded to take care of the old woman himself, as no one else seems inclined to.—Cincinnati Times.

A DOUBLE SATIRE.—The annexed has a sufficiently wide application to be appreciated by the married people of either sex:—

Husband Traveling.—Scene 1st.—Room in hotel. Spittoons full of cigar stumps. Bourbon whisky. Husband in a hurry to be off, writing home:—

DEAREST SUSIE: My time is so occupied with business that I can hardly spare a moment to write to you. Oh! darling, how I miss you, and the only thing that sustains me during my absence is the thought that every moment thus spent is for the benefit of my dear wife and children. Take good care of yourself my dear. Feed the baby on one cow's milk. Excuse haste, etc.

DEAR HUBBY: How lonesome I am in your absence. The hours pass tediously. Nobody calls on me, and I am constantly thinking of the time when you will be home, and your cheerful countenance light up the now dreary routine of everyday life. My household duties keep me constantly employed. I am living as economical as possible, knowing that your small income will not admit of frivolous expenses. But, now, dear, I will say goodby, or I will be too late for the monthly concert of prayer. In haste, yours, etc.

AN IDLE DREAM.—For a man to think that he is going to do the work of his life without obstacles and oppositions, is to dream in the lap of folly's self. What should we amount to, were we not compelled to feel our way, to fall down and get up again, and learn that our theories are never according to the laws of nature, but nothing more than the projection of our own limited perception upon the untried and unreal? We are, however, not to be discouraged on this account; we are rather to be the more satisfied of its being good and right for us. For in adversity and opposition we are; and trials are nothing more than tests of the nature. Up from below do we go above. We are but the products of lower conditions. The material comes its highest, in this life, and gradually refined and got rid of after natural laws. Our experience is merely passing through these changes, which would be just no experience at all if we could manage to escape altogether. We ought not to make complaint, when we see how all the things work together for good.

MANY a rich man, in bringing up his son, seems ambitious of making what Aaron made—a golden calf.

Paris Exposition, - - 1867.

ADVICES JUST RECEIVED BY MAIL ENABLE US to announce positively that the only gold medal for American Sewing Machines was awarded to Elias Howe, Jr., as the manufacturer of the best Sewing Machine that was exhibited There were eighty-two different Machines in competition for the prize, and Mr. Howe received the additional award of the Cross of the Legion of Honor, as manufacturer and inventor. The exact wording of the award is as follows:

HOWE MACHINE.	WHEELER & WILSON.
"Co operateur Elias Howe, Jr., promoteur de la Machine a coudre, Medaille d'or."	"Wheeler & Wilson, pour la machine a buutonniere, Medaille d'or."
TRANSLATION.	TRANSLATION.
Co-operator Elias Howe, Jr., improvement on Sewing Machines, Gold Medal.	Wheeler & Wilson, for Buttonhole Machine, Gold Medal.

The official list of those who were made Knights of the Legion of Honor, as published in the Paris papers, reads thus: "Mons. Elias Howe, Jr., fabricant de machines a coudre expnsant." Which, translated into English, reads: "Elias Howe, Jr., maker of Sewing Machines, exhibiting."
From this it will be seen that the medal awarded to Wheeler & Wilson was for a "Buttonhole Machine," AND NOT FOR THE SEWING MACHINE.

H. A. DEMING, Agent,
No. 137 Kearny street, near Sutter.

An American Knight of the Legion of Honor—Among the many who have been the recipients of medals and honors at the Exhibition at Paris, none stand so high on the list as the celebrated inventor and manufacturer of Sewing Machines, Elias Howe, Jr. The Emperor, who shows great tact and discrimination in these matters, has made Mr. Howe a Knight of the Legion of Honor, and the jury on Sewing Machines, who had the task of testing and awarding prizes for excellence, unanimously decided that Mr. Howe was not only entitled to great honors as the inventor of the Sewing Machines, but that he carried off the palm as a manufacturer as well, and to him was awarded accordingly the first of the only two gold medals assigned this class. The numbers who have called upon Mr. Howe, at his office, No. 64 Regent street, to offer their congratulations, prove that many besides the Emperor and the jury acknowledge the justice of the claim.—The Courier, London, England.

"ANY ONE WILL DO."

A maiden once of certain age,
To catch a husband did engage;
But having passed the prime of life
In striving to become a wife.
Without success, she though it time
To mend the follies of her prime.

Departing from the usual course
Of paint, and such like, for resource,
With all her might, this ancient maid,
Beneath an oak tree knelt and prayed;
Unconscious that a grave owl
Was perched above— the mousing fowl!

"O! give— a husband, give," she cried,
While yet I may become a bride.
Soon will my day of grace be o'er,
And then, like many maids before,
I'll die without an early love,
And none to meet me there above!

"Oh! 'tis a fate too hard to bear;
Then answer this, my humble prayer;
And, oh! a husband give to me!"
Just then the owl in a tree,
In deep bass tones, cried, "whoo, who, who?"
"Who, Lord? And dost thou ask me who?
Why, any one, good Lord, will do."

A WATER SPOUT.—A letter from Wiesbaden gives some details of a singular calamity that has befallen that town. A few evenings back a water spout, greater than those of 1810 and 1832, broke over the place, causing incalculable damage. The Kursaal had been all but destroyed. Enormous stones and articles of furniture were carried along the streets by the torrent, which in one place made a channel for itself nearly six meters deep. Three houses are said to have fallen, and the celebrated Neroberg vine, belonging to the Duke of Noyan, is totally ruined. Two women and three children are reported to have perished. In the evening the mud and the dead fish—several crab had been at an early hour caught in the Place du Theatre—exhaled so bad an oder that an epidemic is feared. Some persons say that they felt the shock of an earthquake.

A LADY found occasion to call upon a dentist to have her teeth filled. Among those filled were two front ones, and when in a pleasant mood the lady's face shone with smiles while polished gold shone from the upper incisors. These were observed with admiration by her little niece, who, by-and-by, curiously remarked; "Annt Mary, I wish I had copper teeth like yours."

VINELAND, (N. J.) which was an uninhabited site six years ago, produced and shipped to New York and Philadelphia the strawberry season just clossd, 143,349 quarts of the fruit. Besides there were canned by a company at that place, 28,000 quarts, and 40,000 quarts were consumed at home, This makes a crop of 171,349 quarts. It is said that the crop of blackberries will be fully as large, but of raspberries there will not be so large a crop.

MUSCULAR STRENGTH.—the most prodigious power of muscle is exhibited by the fish. The whale moves with a velocity through a dense medium, water, that would carry him around the world in less than a fortnight!

TO EPICURES.—There is considerable difference between a gourmand and a gourmet. In the gourmand the animal nature predominates, while the gourmet cultivates the sense of taste until it is rendered susceptible of receiving the highest gratification. The gourmand is satisfied to swill flat beer or sour wine, to eat ill-cooked viands, provided he can get enough to gorge himself withal. Epicures, or gourmets, who can appreciate the delicate bouquet of a fine wine as they delight in the perfume of the violet, should pay a visit to the store of F. C. Belden, No. 612 Sacramento street, where they will find the rarest brands of wines, spirits and liqueurs, the choicest teas and an immense assortment of delicacies, such as truffles, pate de fois gras, Stilton cheese, caviare, etc.

GRAND TRIAL
....OF....
SEWING MACHINES.

CONTEST BETWEEN THE
FLORENCE AND WILLCOX & GIBBS.

THE
WILLCOX & GIBBS
TRIUMPHANT!

At the Great UNION FAIR, held at Island Park, between Albany and Troy, in September, two Premiums were offered on Sewing Machines, one for the BEST and the other for the "Second Best"—competition being open to the State.

On the first day of the Fair, the Troy Agent of Florence Sewing Machine Company, having, jointly with the Albany Agent of the same Machine, entered it for competition, published in the Troy Daily Times a challenge to Agents of other Sewing Machines, to meet them at said Fair and compete with them for the Premium.

The challenge was accepted by the Troy and Albany Agents of the Willcox and Gibbs Machine.

Each party was to prepare and subject to the judges a "list" of the several "points of merit" on account of which "superiority" was claimed. These "points" were to be separately considered, thoroughly investigated and practically tested, by work done then and there, upon each of the machines; and then decided in favor of the machine which was adjudged to excel on that "point."

Finally it was agreed that the machine which, at the conclusion of the trial, should be found to have the greatest number of those "points" decided in its favor should be decided the "BEST SEWING MACHINE," and awarded the FIRST PREMIUM.

The result of the trial was, that the

WILLCOX & GIBBS WON THE VICTORY

and the prize, by the extraordinary superiority of thirty-five points, decided in its favor, against two points in favor of the Florence.

Full notes were taken of the trial.

It is a fact worthy of remark, that during the entire trial—which continued without intermission for nearly seven hours—not a stitch was missed, nor the thread once broken, nor a needle broken or bent, by the Willcox and Gibbs machine. No kind of work was attempted to be done on it that was not accomplished, and done in a perfect and workmanlike manner; and no effort was made on it that was not entirely successful; while neither of these statements can be truly made in favor of the Florence.

This remarkable trial can not fail, through the facts developed by it, to be productive of important results. It has raised the veil and exposed to public view the true character of the opposition, who will no longer be able to deceive the public by misrepresenting the character and merits of the Willcox and Gibbs machine.

It is an improvement on double thread machines; and its "stitch," which was severely tested by the Judges, was decided to be much stronger and less liable to rip in use or wear than the "Lock Stitch."

It is the simplest in construction—does the greatest variety of work—makes no noise—is not liable to get out of order—costs the least money, and gives the best satisfaction.

☞ Full reports of this trial sent free to any address.

AYER'S

AGUE CURE,

FOR THE SPEEDY CURE OF

Intermittent Fever, or Fever and Ague, Remittent Fever, Dumb Ague, Periodical Headache, or Billious Fevers, indeed for the whole Class of Diseases originating in Biliary Derangement, Caused by the Malaria of Miasmatic Countries.

No one remedy is louder called for by the necessities of the American people than a sure and safe cure for Fever and Ague. Such we are now enabled to offer, with a perfect certainty that it will eradicate the disease, and with assurance founded on proof, that no harm can arise from its use in any quantity.

That which protects from or prevents this disorder must be of immense service in the communities where it prevails. Prevention is better than cure, for the patient escapes the risk which he must run in violent attacks of this baleful distemper This "Cure" expels the miasmic poison of Fever and Ague from the system, and prevents the development of the disease, if taken on the first approach of the premonitary symptoms. It is not only the best remedy ever yet discovered for this class of complaints, but also the cheapest. The large quantity we supply for a dollar brings it within reach of every body, and in the bilious districts, where Fever and Ague prevails, everybody should have it and use it freely both for cure and prevention. A great superiority of this remedy over any other ever discovered for the speedy and certain cure of Intermittents is, that it contains in Quinine or mineral, consequently it produces no quinsmo or other injurious effects whatever upon the constitution. Those cured by it are left as healthy as if they had never had the disease.

Fever and Ague is not alone the consequence of the miasmatic poison. A great variety of disorders arise from its irritation, among which are Neuralgia, Rheumatism, Gout, Headache, Bliodness, Toothache, Earache, Catarrh, Asthma, Palpitation, Painful Affection of the Spleen, Hysterics, Pain in the Bowels, Colic, Paralysis, and Derangement of the Stomach, all of which, when originating in this cause, put on the intermittent type, or become periodical. This "Cure" expels the poison from the blood, and consequently cures them all alike.

NEW REMEDIES! NEW REMEDIES!

Dr. Gibbon's Dispensary.

ESTABLISHED IN 1854,
616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco.

For the treatment of Sexual and Seminal Diseases, such as gonorrhœa, gleet, stricture, syphilis in all its forms, seminal weakness, impotency, &c. Skin Diseases, (of years' standing,) and Ulcerated legs, successfully treated.

HORRIBLE DISEASES.

How many thousands of persons both male and female are there who are suffering out a miserable existence from the effects of secret indulgence, or from virus absorbed into the system. Look at their pallid, emaciated and disfigured faces, and their broken constitutions, disqualifying them for the happiness of marriage or the enjoyment of life. In this horrid situation thousands suffer until death closes the scene. Let parents, guardians and friends, attend to those who are suffering with any of these horrible, life-destroying maladies—see that they are cared for and cured before it be too late. Send them to Dr. Gibbon, a physician who has made private diseases his especial study for years, and who is certain to cure the most inveterate cases without mercury or any injurious drugs. It is important to those who are afflicted, to be careful of the many pretended Doctors who infest all cities, publishing their skill in curing all diseases in a few days, imposing upon the public by using the names of eminent physicians from Europe and other places. Be therefore careful and make strict inquiry, or you may fall into the hands of these charlatans.

Syphilis is syphilis the world over; so is small pox, consumption, and other diseases, to the contrary of what quacks may say.

SEMINAL WEAKNESS.

Seminal weakness the consequent of self abuse. This solitary vice, or depraved sexual indulgence, is practiced by the youth of both sexes to an almost unlimited extent, producing with unnering certainty the following train of morbid symptoms, unless combatted by scientific medical measure; sallow countenances, dark spots under the eyes, pain in the head, ringing in the ears, noise like the rustling of leaves and rattling of chariots, uneasines about the loins, weakness of the limbs, confused vision, blunt intellect, loss of confidence, diffidence in approaching strangers, a dislike to form new acquaintances, a disposition to shun society, loss of memory, hectic flushes, pimples and various eruptions about the face, furred tongue, fetid breath, coughs, consumption, night sweats, monomania, and frequent insanity. If relief be not obtained, should apply immediately, either in person or by letter, and have a cure effected by his new and scientific mode of treating this complaint, which never fails of effecting a quick and radical cure. Dr. G. will give $100 to any person who will prove satisfactorily to him that he was cured by either of the San Francisco quacks.

Dr. Gibbon is responsible, and will give each patient a written instrument binding himself to effect a radical and permanent cure or make no charge.

Persons at a distance may be cured at home by addressing a letter to Dr. Gibbon, stating case, symptoms, length of time the disease has continued, and have medicine promptly forwarded, free from damage and curiosity, to any part of the country, with full and plain directions for use, for ten dollars, sent in a registered letter, or through Wells, Fargo & Co.

Address DR. J. F. GIBBON, 616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco, Postoffice Box 252.

CAUTION TO THE UNFORTUNATE.

Beware of the San Francisco quacks and pretenders who with bogus sworn-to certificates, dupe the unwary. Some of the self styled doctors whose names are to be found in all the daily and weekly papers of San Francisco and other places, are tradesmen, and become too lazy to work at their trade. Some are tinsmiths, shoemakers, newspaper carriers, intelligence offices keepers, etc. Look over the San Francisco City Directory and you will find their former occupation in it. Look at the Directory for 1862-63. The only way to avoid imposition is make inquiry—it will cost you nothing and may save you many regrets, for advertising physicians in eight cases out of ten are hogus, there is no safety in trusting any of them till you know who and what they are. Dr. Gibbon does not deceive people by exhibiting bogus titles, certificates, pretended patients' letters, etc. Dr. Gibbon Will satisfy, persons who may call at his office of his ability to treat diseases that he proposes to cure.

☞ Persons writing to Dr. Gibbon will Please state the name of the paper they see his advertisement in.

BABBITTONIAN,

OR SELF-TEACHING

PENMANSHIP

The System of Babbitonian Penmanship is pre-eminently self-instructing. With its ample explanations of right and wrong forms—its sixty wood cuts—its plain intelligent rules, one may sit down by his own fireside and become a finer Penman than he could at much greater cost in the usual way with a living teacher.

There is a great demand for fine Penmen in the commercial world, and this system, at a trifling expense, imparts a skillful command of the Pen, worth hundreds of dollars to the fortunate possessor.

Penmanship is an indispensable accomplishment to Ladies, and this system is elaborate in a series of elegant copies in the Ladies' Style.

Business men have sometimes lost thousands of dollars from ignorance in regard to Business forms, and there is furnished in a set, without additional charge, a fine variety of Business Forms and Abbreviations. To sum up the Excellencies of this System, it is—

1—Scientific in its Arrangement of Principles;
2—Artistic in its Movements and Flourishes;
3—Practical in its Combinations and Applications;
4—Stylish in its neat and chaste Gracefulness;
5—Superior for Legibility, Rapidity and Beauty;
6—Most Disciplinary for fingers, Arms and Muscles.
7—Unexcelled for Comprehensiveness and Simplicity.
8—Complete and Self-Teaching for Private Learners;
9—Time, Labor and Expense Saving for Pupils and Teachers.

The Babbitonian Penmanship

Is published on durable card-board slips, ninety-two copies illustrated, put in a neat package with a Chart, the whole complete at the low price of $1 50.

Babbittonian Pens.

One reason why the country is flooded with poor Pens is that they are generally made by mechanics, rather than by artistic and experienced Penmen, the only parties really understanding the requirements of a good article.

The Babbittonian Pens,

Made in the most finished style, by skilful artisans, after models prepared according to the combined wisdom and experience of several amateurs and old Professors of Penmanship, are admirably adapted to meet the public wants.

The Babbittonian Ladies' Pen,

Is one of the most exquisite little instruments for delicate writing ever constructed.

The Babbittonian Extra Fine Pen,

Is pronounced by a large number of Penmen to be more free, more durable, and more varied in capacity for either fine or coarse strokes than any foreign Pen whatever. Suitable for elegant writing, it is a great favorite with the ladies and gentlemen.

The Babbittonian Business Pen,

Having great freedom and variety of movement, is unequaled for general business or school purposes. Somewhat coarser than the Extra Fine, it wears longer and moves more easily on paper.

☞ This Pen is now in use in the large countinghouses and banks in this city.

A RARE GEM OF ART.

"The Lord's Prayer,"

A pen drawing, by Mr. D. F. Brown, is one of the most remarkable works of art ever exhibited in this country. By patient labor he has succeeded in producing a design which for skill and beauty of execution, exquisite softness and delicacy of finish, and general merit, it would seem scarcely possible to surpass. The central figure—the face of our Savior—is one of marvelous power and beauty. This and the faces of the Twelve Apostles, forming the border of the piece, are faithful copies from Leonardo da Vinci's famous painting of the

LAST SUPPER,

Re-producing, with the softest and most perfect shadings, the conceptions and characteristic expressions of the originals. Within this enclosure the words of the Lord's Prayer, in ornamental letters of various original designs and exquisite finish, are an interesting study of art in themselves; while appropriately distributed among these, miniture groups and scenes of marked events of Savior's life, copied from the great masters—five of them from Raphel a celebrated designs—form a harmonious completion of this unique, beautiful and truly wonderful work. The faces of

OUR LORD AND HIS APOSTLES.

Alone, so finely copied, would be a treasure in any house, and worth the full price of subscription.

Address of the People's Nominating Committee.

The undersigned, called together by their fellow citizens as an INDEPENDENT MUNICIPAL NOMINATING CONVENTION, for the purpose of recommending to the suffrages of the people of this city candidates for the various municipal and judicial offices to be filled at the approaching September and October elections, herewith submit to the consideration of the public the foregoing Municipal ticket.

In discharge of the serious duty assigned to us, we have sought to be guided solely by a sincere desire to secure the highest public good. In our selections of men we have aimed to regard the qualifications of the various candidates and their characters, and their qualifications and character alone, irrespective of our personal friendships or their polical affilitions.

We believe that the principle which should control all the citizens of San Francisco in the choice of their city officers ought to be this, and only this: "The right man in the right place:" and upon this principle we have endeavored to act in all our nominations. We have attempted to be above prejudice and bias. We have tried to make careful and thorough investigation respecting each candidate presented, and to act with such wisdom as has been possessed by us, and our decisions have been made after what seemed to us due deliberation.

The result of our labors we now submit to you, fellow-citizens, in the hope that your approval of our action may be found in your hearty endorsement of the ticket now presented, and in the election of all the candidates appearing thereupon.

TO THE PEOPLE of CALIFORNIA

A CARD.

GEO. C. GORHAM ON CHINESE SUFFRAGE.

THE FOLLOWING CARD OVER THE SIGNATURE of GEORGE C. GORHAM, appears in the San Francisco Press, and is now republished to show the people of California how that gentleman, while claiming the suffrages of the people of the State for the highest office in their gift, can deny the truth of his own published and recorded statements:

SAN FRANCISCO, August 17, 1857.

H. J. TILDEN, Esq., Chairman State Central Committee —Dear Sir:—A circular has met my eye in which it is stated that I favor Chinese Suffrage. As a final answer to all the din raised on this subject, I wish to say to the people of the State, through you, that I am not, and never have been in favor of the extension of the Suffrage to the Chinese.

The Democracy are reduced to desperate straits, when they find it necessary to reiterate the oft exploded falsehood contained in the Circular alluded to.

Please give this circulation in the Union papers, and have it advertised in the Sacramento Union and Bee, and San Francisco Bulletin and Morning Call.

(Signed) Yours, truly, GEO. C. GORHAM.

Proof of the Utter Falsity of this Card.

Gorham says to Colonel Gray, in reply to the celebrated Chinese letter of the latter gentlemnn, April 19, 1867:

"I (Gorham) believe in the universal brotherhood of man."

"I (Gorham) cannot believe that you (Gray), an old Republican of 1856, became so imbued with caste prejudices, while sitting as a delegate at the Philadelphia Convention, as to be ready to deny the right of man to the humblest of your fellow-creatures."

Gorham, in his published address to the people of California, June 18th, says:

"The war of opinion is not yet fought through. It is to go on until National Citizenship shall be beyond the control of local authority, and manhood alone be the test of a right to a voice in the Government."

Speaking of the amendment of the Federal Constitution, Gorham said at Platt's Hall, July 10th:

"If this change is made, it will obviate the necessity of an amendment to our State Constitution, which will otherwise soon be demanded by the popular sense of justice, enfranchising those of the United States resident in this State who are excluded from voting on account of color."

Gorham said at Platt's Hall, August 13th, that he "denounced the accursed heresy that this was a WHITE MAN'S country alone. He respectfully requested that EVERY MAN who feared the negro and Chinaman in competition should vote against him at the polls."

Thus stands George C. Gorham convicted by his own words; and no means of escape remains for him, except to deny that he ever wrote Colonel Gray, or published an address to the people, or a Card to the Chairman of his Committee, one or the other, or the whole of them.

City Gossip.

HORACE HAWES.—This gentleman held a mass meeting on his own responsibility at Platt's Hall on Tuesday evening last. A band of brass music was present, and two young men at the door dispensed gratis Hawaian literature. Horace is extensive in stature, owns a long nose, (the Napoleonic test of greatness,) a large mouth, lofty forehead, gray whiskers, and wiggish looking hair. The body is pliant and bends like a weeping willow when speaking. His voice, generally loud, falls at times so low that no one can hear him save himself, and we doubt if he accomplishes that feat always. Horace conveys the idea of being thoroughly honest.

Horace reviewed his past course. He has done the State, county and city some service, and he knows it. There was the Consolidation Bill, which plugged up a leak in the city treasury amounting to one million four hundred thousand and forty-seven dollars, the law which established a political heaven in the government of San Mateo county, the Justices Reform Bill, which prevented all that class of gentry in this city from becoming millionaires in less than six months, and last, but not least, the Registry Act, for which he has been abused worse than was Moses by the Israelites for leading them out of bondage. He admitted some errors in the practical workings of this law, and promised if re-elected to the office of joint senator from San Mateo and San Francisco to do his best to remedy them. Mr. Stebbins fired the last oratorical gun. Mr. Stebbins is not a candidate—yet both are good men if they do "speak in meeting."

FIRES.—Fires have been uncommonly frequent during the last week. The skating palace on Long Bridge, and the Odeum, places where people endeavored to amuse themselves on Sunday, are among the more notable edifices which have gone the way of all wooden buildings. The British ship Blackwall was also fired while laying out in the stream and partially destroyed. All this is very annoying to the Insurance Companies and the Paid Fire Department. Housekeepers must be more careful and look well after their matches, particularly those of California manufacture, which are as inflammable as an Irishman's temper on St. Patrick's day; an Englishman at hearing disrespectful remarks concerning Queen Vic, or an ardent Gorhamite at mention of the Bulletin or Sacramento Union.

POLITICES MADE EASY.—"If people cannot vote for Haight, they should vote for Fay."—Call.

The wayfaring man, particularly if a fool, cannot go astray politically, if he heeds the advice tendered with such charming simplicity by the Call.

YOUNG AMERICA.—"Let her rip! father's rich and mother's got the money."

Such was the cry raised by the Yale and Harvard students belonging to the boat clubs while "on the rampage," destroying fifteen thousand dollars' worth of doors, windows, mirrors, crockery—in fact everything breakable and smashable at the Worcester Hotel. Fine commentary on the domestic training of the youthful citizens of this grand and glorious Republic, isn't it? "Fathers' rich and mother's got the money." Yes, that's about all that the paternal and maternal relatives of these destructive scholars do possess. We imagine father's a shoddyite or a petroleumite, and mother wears No. 8 shoes sans instep.

AN UNMELODIOS PIG.—The six-legged pig show at the corner of California and Montgomery streets has been stopped. The centipedal swine says she was as much bored by the horrid din as "any other hook-keeper," and that the nuisance ought from the first to have been abated under the law for the prevention of cruelty to animals. She evidently has no ear for music.

PATRIOTISM MADE EASY.—"The opponents of Gorham & Co., either on the Haight or Fay ticket are patriots," etc.—Call.

Of course they were patriots on one side or the other. Dan Gelwicks, Democratic candidate for State Printer, for instance. He was a Confederate patriot, and right manfully did he, on paper, in the heart of the enemy's country, prosecute his part of the war.

FEMALE POLITICAL INTEREST.—Said a lady to us not long since, with that charming simplicity, which is a characteristic of the gentler sex, when they try their intellects on the comprehension of the mysterious masculine and awful kingdom of politics: "It seems to me one cannot tell anything about the result of the coming election. Mr. Gorham's friends do say he will certainly be elected, and so do Mr. Haight's. What do you think of it, Mr. Pobbles.

Here was an opportunity to talk and display political knowledge. Previously we had not spoken a word or expressed an idea for a quarter of an hour. We commenced, "Mrs. ——, the result of the coming election cannot, with accuracy, be foretold. While there seems to be a strong Gorhamite tendency in the interior, things look fearfully favorable for Haight in this city. The National Republicans have nominated Mr. Fay, a gubernatorial candidate obviously with no other view than that of defeating the regular Union party. This shameful proceeding, Madam, is endorsed by the Bulletin and Sacramento Union. Beside, Mr. Gorham suffers severely from the conflicting reports regarding his views of Chinese suffrage. Now, in my opinion"—

"O, Mr. Pobbles," suddenly broke out this lady, "what do you think of Charley Stoddard's new book?"

And yet women who thus treat valuable political information with such disrespect come out boldly and ask for the privilege of exercising the elective franchise! My bleeding country! whither art thou drifting?

OUR PETROLEUM STOVE.—This eccentric, wonderful, and at one time supposed dangerous culinary beast is becoming very tractable. We've tamed him. It cuts up no more diabolical shines save once in a while when left alone with the servant girl. It loves to frighten her; but then it don't mean anything dangerous. She's afraid of it, and prays to the ferruginous and asphaltic monster every night and morning. If a little wicked it is very clever. Machines, as well as men, are inclined to be a little wicked. It cooks wonderfully—makes up its own fire in the morning—sends to market and gets trusted for beef—brings hot coffe to our bedside at six o'clock A. M.—rings the first bell to rouse us from our slumbers—then rings for family prayers—then for breakfast—washes our feet and shirts—"suffereth long and is kind, is not puffed up, thinketh no evil," votes for Gorham—favors female suffrage—and is not opposed to the eight hour movement.

EVIDENCES OF SAN FRANCISCO INDUSTRY AND INGENUITY TO BE sent to the coming Agricultural State Fair, at Sacramento.—The Stratman patent for curing disloyalty. The general appearance of this apparatus is that of a well proportioned man with a large moustache. Upon the utterance of any disloyal expressions in its immediate vicinity, the flexors and extensors of its right arm are worked with great force and rapidity, and a huge bunch of fives descends with great force on the nasal projection of the offensive object. It has sustained a number of successful trials. It also sells all the latest newspapers, magazines and periodicals, Eastern, Foreign and domestic, with unexampled rapidity and dispatch.

THE GRADUAL ELIMINATION OF DEMOCRATIC HARDNESS.—Jo Hamilton, in a recent speech, remarked that the Democracy had formerly been a hard party. There are certainly some evidences of reform, moral and political, among the Democrats; yet, judging from the insurrectionary symptoms manifested not long since at a Republican meeting in front of Platt's Hall, it would appear that the obstropolous Democratic youth has some hard lumps left in him yet. We have been among Indians, who four years previous, would have been greatly pleased to "lift" our auburn locks but they didn't—and why? Because there were among them unpleasant recollections of severe and summary castigation for such uncalled-for tonsorial operations.

The Democracy is not very "hard" now, and why? A severe pummelling is apt to leave some soft spots. It will all eventually be worked out by the same method.

HOW TO PUT UP NICHOLSON PAVEMENT.—The process of laying the Nicholson Pavement in Merchant street is now completed, and that thoroughfare presents a clean, clear and unbroken surface, over which any number of respectable citizens may walk directly into the office of the CALIFORNIAN and subscribe for this valuable and interesting paper. The sidewalk is no longer encumbered with heaps of blocks, gravel, boards and tar boilers, consequently our editorial corps now succeed at night in finding their way to their room with some degree of regularity.

Nicholson Pavement is put up thus. This prescription will answer for one block

Tar, hot	2 bbls.
Square blocks	One big pile.
Men	Six to eight.
Women	000.
Gravel sifted	Small pile.
Boards	Several thousand feet.

Mix thoroughly; soak blocks in tar; boards ditto; "set 'em up;" sprinkle gravel, ditto tar; pound, ram, and smoke the whole neighborhood thoroughly.

P. S.—Stimulating drinks may be taken with impunity while the operation is going on.

MARK TWAIN.—Mark Twain is probably by this time in the Holy Land. Mark will first direct his steps to the spot rendered to him sacred by association with Ananias, an individual whose regard for veracity was fully equal to that of Mark himself. It is not unlikely that Ananias' shade will accompany Mark throughout his wanderings, a mutual, beautiful, and natural sympathy being established between them, more particularly arising from Mark's efforts to repopularize Ananias about a year and a half ago, when he introduced him to the San Francisco public, as engaged in the business of swapping lies with Fitz-Smythe, on the outskirts of hell.

Aid to the Enemy.

The Hon. Thos. Fitch made a very eloquent speech on Wednesday evening at the American Theatre. Like many other eloquent men he said some silly things. The following remark is likely to give more aid and comfort to the enemy of Mr. Fitch's party than probably any of the nonsense which will be uttered during the campaign:

"In filthy habits, in peculiar ideas, in manners and in customs, the Chinaman and the Democrats were alike; and if there had been any chance of using John, they would have got him."

There are many "Black Republicans" who will object to this statement. Andrew Jackson was a Democrat, yet he was not like a Chinaman. Thomas Jefferson was superior to most of the Chinamen in California in personal cleanliness, and the same remark refers to Thomas H. Benton and Stephen A. Douglas. Really, Mr. Fitch, this is coming it a little too strong, cutting it a little too fat, in fact going the whole hog. This is not the manner in which to convert our erring Democratic brethren to sound Congressional opinions. Many respectable men have been Democrats and many more will be. The Republican party does not monopolize all the respectability of the country.

Land Swallowers.

Many croakers are fond of prophesying that San Francisco will some day be swallowed by an earthquake. According to A. M. Comstock, who spoke at the Pueblo meeting in the Academy of Music, Saturday last, the outside lands of San Francisco have been already swallowed up, not by earthquakes, but by Supervisors. He says:

"Col. Hayes was a Supervisor, and he swallowed 160 acres of the pueblo land at a gulp. William Greer was a Supervisor, and he swallowed a large tract. Dr. Rowell was a Supervisor, and he swallowed a large tract."

Dr. Rowell should be made to throw up that large tract if he has to have large and repeated doses of his own medicines. Of course all these ravenous Supervisors will cast up their lots just as the whale cast up Jonah if a few more meetings are held at Platt's Hall. Comstock's the man to make them sick. Then we'll all have a lot a-piece if its only 6x4 feet in Lone Mountain.

An Interesting Newspaper.

The local news of the Bulletin is now-a-days of the most thrilling description. Fitz-Smythe must look to his laurels. The story of the bald headed girl who wore a wig, and went to Woodward's Garden and got it snatched off by an ape, which appeared in yesterday's issue, is equal to the best efforts of the humorist of the Alta. This is what the ape did:

"A malicious smirk played over his features, he threw his eyebrows back, and springing with the rapidity of lightning against the side of the cage, thrust his long arms through the bars and caught hold upon the ringlets. The lady screamed, but not with pain, for in an instant the false collection was inside the cage, and she stood before the spectators with head as bald as if 70 winters had poured their frosts and snows upon it."

Very Particular.

Every now and again matrimonial advertisements appear in the daily papers. We clip the following from a morning paper:

MATRIMONIAL.—A young man wishes to become acquainted with some respectable young Girl, with a view to matrimony. She must have a fair education, good temper, high forehead, blue eyes, and straight nose; would prefer rather tall. Such a girl can find a comfortable home, and a true and loving husband.

We think that young man is quite right in bargaining for a fair education and good temper, but why so particular about the straight nose? Should a man be led by the nose to marry a girl? We fear that young man will have some difficulty in finding a girl who exactly answers the description. Couldn't he put up with one with a good education and a fair temper, one high; with regard to her forehead, but low as to stature, one with blue eyes but a crooked nose? If he cannot get one to suit him with regard to these particulars he had better have one made to order.

Discriminating Theatrical Criticism.

The talented theatrical critic of the Alta is occasionally very discriminating in his criticisms. For instance: in his notice of the first night's performance of True to the Core, he says.

"It has many striking situations which will be very effective on a second night's performance; one of the best was almost spoiled last night by the slowness of the lightning which should strike the mast of the ship."

Ajax defied the lightning, the Alta's critic—a judge of lightning—criticises the Metropolitan Theatre's lightning as too slow. It struck the ship too slowly, and thus destroyed a striking situation. We are glad to state that the lightning has, ever since that first night, been as fast as could be desired, and is of a quality which will stand criticism.

CIRCUMSTANCE.

FOUR little seasons, from May to May,
And here you stand by my side again,
With nothing altered, of all, to-day,
But the heart you offered then.

I reckon you neither false nor cold:
Why quarrel with wrong so lightly done?
Love is a tale that is often told,
But truly—to only one.

The power that drew you was never I;
Not I, but the flowers we plucked together;
The odorous eves, the fickle sky,
The blossomy April weather.

Those violet scents would cling, be sure;
Breathing a sweetness about my name;
A seeming life, that could just endure
Till the one real passion came.

What wonder the fresh brown rose exceeds
Those withered violets, pale and old?
And, soul of your soul, this new love needs
No memories' added hold!

I touched but a fancy—let it go!
My future, likewise, may haply bring
That heart, as dear in December snow
As the budding warmth of Spring.

OLD STORIES RE-TOLD.

THEATRICAL FAREWELLS. GARRICK AND SIDDONS.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

I.—DAVID GARRIC.

AT the beginning of 1776, theatrical London was both startled and distressed to hear rumors clear and confident in the clubs and in the dark, louder and more certain in the green-room, of Garrick's intention to leave the stage, where he had so long reigned the delight and wonder of the age and the emperor of all hearts.

It had long been known that Barry's rivalry (Barry was the most ardent and tender of Romeos) had compelled the great actor to exertions far beyond his strength. The death of his energetic coadjutor, Mr Lacy, the joint patentee of Drury Lane, had also thrown upon Garrack a burden too great for him to bear. From 1773 (the date of Mr. Lacy's death), he had almost abandoned Bosworth Field, Dover Cliff, and the gloomy fortress at Dunsinane, for his even more congenial haunts in the wainscoted drawing rooms and palace antechambers of comedy, where, aided by charming Mrs. Abington, the best would-be fine lady ever seen on the boards, he still bantered as Benedict, mounted the ladder as Ranger, blustered as Don Felix, or became a mean and exquisite gull as Abel Drugger.

In January, 1776, appeared a poor farce of Colman's called The Spleen, or Islington Spa, meant to ridicule the affectation of would-be fashionable citizens, who, discontented with their own snug independence, had vainly tried to turn a Pentonville chalybeate into the centre of a second city of Bath. The piece ran for a fortnight only. In the prologue, written by Garrick, with his usual neatness and vivacity, public allusion was first made to the intended retirement of the author. After describing the restless cit, who, envious of Lord Flimsy and the Maccaronis, retires to his villa at Islington, and among his leaden gods and box-tree peacocks, sighs for the merry bustle of butcher row, the writer says;

> The master of this shop, too, seeks repose,
> Sells off his stock-in-trade—his verse and prose,
> His dagger, buskins, thunder, lightning, and old clothes.

Garrick was already preparing for that solemn last scene of all.

> That ends this strange, eventful history.

A few days after the appearance of The Spa, Garrack produced the farce of Bon Ton. He had written this satire of the follies imported from France, as a present for his favorite actor, King, who appeared in it, together with arch Mrs. Abington and sensible Miss Pope.

The versatile genius who had first appeared on the stage at Ipswhich in 1741 as Aboan, in Southern's Oronoka, Sir Harry Wildair, and Harlequin, was about to close his triumphs, and leave his mimic world.

He was rich, he was famous; the wise, the learned, and the beautiful crowded to his almost royal levees still:

> Superfluous lagged the veteran on the stage.

The call-boy now spoke with a hollow and warning voice, and the prompter was old age. It had been a long phantasmagoric life of pleasure and success since, as a trim lad of eighteen, he and his strange, clever, unsuccessful schoolmaster had set out from Litchfield to try their fortunes in London. A long procession of years had passed before him since in Goodman's Field he first defied the rivalry of Macklin, Quin, and Cibber, and set Mrs. Clive, Mrs. Pritchard, and Mrs. Woffington talking of the clever young man with the large dark eyes who had been praised by Lord Orrery, and who had even drawn the great Mr. Pope from Twickenham. Hogarth, too, was full of admiration. The string of the "quality" carriages had reached from Temple Bar to the little theatre. The mad king, the generous hero, the butterfly rake, the honest farmer, the maddened tyrant, had all changed at last into the one final character of the almost worn-out old man. Those great elastic eyebrows had lost their spring; the subtle mouth its magic power; those supernatural eyes their hidden fire and sunshine; age, cruel age, had disenchanted that gifted face, which had so well mimicked all the passions of our species; the voice, once clear as a clarion, melodious as a flute, varied as the note of a mocking-bird, was fast sinking to childish treble. All London felt keenly what a source of pleasure was henceforth to be closed to them. Garrick's parsimony and nervous vanity were now forgotten, his virtues and genius better remembered. His Brute and Bayes, his Lear and Richard, his Kitely and Drugger, had been the friends of the town for years, and the most intellectual men had spent their most innocent and happiest hours in their society.

That Garrick felt intense pain at the thought of this impending parting there can be no doubt. He was like the sleeping knight in Tasso's enchanted garden of Armida, now at last to be roughly awoke and expelled from the golden world of dreams. The stage crown was to be laid down, the stage sceptre was to be given to other hands. The painted forests of Arden were to be quitted, the dim magic light of the darkened stage, the pasteboard fortresses, and Richard's royal couch, were to be seen no more; red fire was no longer to glare upon him; stage jewels were to be laid aside. He was to go forth in his old age into to the cold, garish, prosaic outer world, and to leave his courtiers and armies, his conspirators and peasants, to be governed by another. Like Caliban, he must have wept to "dream again."

Shakspeare himself had a deep sense of the perishable nature of an actor's fame. It is easier to describe a special rainbow, or the swift vision of a momentary sunbeam, than to convey an impression to those who have not seen him what even Robson was like in his climaxes of nervous irritation alternating with quiety. Who can describe justly Macready's Werner or Virginius, the elder Kean's tiger-like rage, or the generous manliness of Bannister? The actor's true fame perishes with his life; after death it is only a fitful and varying tradition. It soon becomes disputed whether Roscius or Garrick were or were not better than the Boanerges of this or that theatre, he who acts Othello like the mad butcher that he is, and croaks through Hamlet like the raven on Macbeth's battlements. It really ceases when the footlights are put out after the last appearance. The poem and novel may be eternal, the picture has its own more precarious but still long existence, the conquest is remembered by the future misery it entails; but the actor, the actor is

> Such stuff
> As dreams are made of, and his little life
> Is rounded by a sleep.

His painted world of laughter and of tears is but the baseless fabric of vision; his cloud capped towers are but as the evening shadows, and melt into air—into thin air.

Garrick had already felt some bitter foretastes of death. The worst kick the dying lion receives is from the hoof of an ass. The detractors, who often appear like bats in the twilight of a great man's life, began to say that as Ranger he had got old in the legs; that his face was now too wrinkled and his eye too lustreless for Romeo; that his voice was too hoarse and hollow for Hamlet. His dimples had become pits, said they; his neck was sinewy; his upper lip was like a turgid piece of leather. Cibber had been better as Bayes, Quinn as Sir John Brute and Macbeth; the town had disliked his Hotspur. O'Brien had been a smarter coxcomb and man of fashion. Mas. Cive had surpassed him in low comedy. Quin in Lear, Johnson in nature, Mrs. Porter in passionate tragedy. These foolish haters hated as strongly as if they could derive pecuniary benefit from a great man's downfall, and Garrick, all nerved and vanity, Garrick, the man who wrote his own critiques, quivered at every gnat-bite as if he had been crunched by the teeth of a tiger.

> Three acts are done, the jest grows stale,
> The lamps are growing dim and pale,
> And reason asks cui bono?

The night before he quitted the stage for ever, Garrick bade farewell to tragedy. He played Lear to the Cordelia of Miss Younge. His biographer, Murphy, tells us where Garrick got his model for the mad king. He says:

"When he began to study this great and difficult part, he was acquainted with a worthy man who lived in Leman street-Goodman's Fields; this friend had an only daughter about two years old; he stood at his dining-room window fondling the child, and dangling it in his arms, when it was his misfortune to drop the infant into a flagged area, and killed it on the spot. He remained at his window screaming in the agonies of grief. The neighbors flocked to the house, took up the child, and delivered it dead to the unhappy father, who wept bitterly, and filled the the street with lamentations. He lost his senses, and from that moment never recovered his understanding. As he had sufficient fortune, his friends chose to let him remain in his house under two keepers appointed by Dr. Monro. Garrick frequently went to see his distracted friend, who passed the remainder of his life in going to the window, and their playing in fancy with his child. After some dalliance he dropped it, and, bursting into a flood of tears, filled the house with shrieks of grief and bitter anguish. He then sat down in a pensive mood, his eyes fixed on one object, at times looking slowly round as if to implore compassion. Garrick was often present at this scene of misery, and was ever after used to say that it gave him the first idea of King Lear's madness."

As the curtain fell on the dead king and his dead daughter, Lear and Cordelia lay on the stage side by side and hand in hand. They rose together, and hand in hand still went in silence to the dressing room followed by many of the company. They stood there, Lear and Cordelia, still bound by the strong sympathy of the play, hand in hand, and without speaking. At last Garrick said, mournfully, and with a sigh:

"Ah! Bessie, this is the last time I shall ever be your father—the last time!"

Then their hands fell asunder.

Miss Younge replied with an affectionate hope that, before they finally parted, he would kindly give her a father's blessing.

Garrick raised his hands solemnly; Miss Younge bent her knee, and bowed her fair head, as the old man fervently prayed God to bless her. Then slowly turning, he said, "May God bless you all!" and retired to take off his King Lear dress for the last time.

When Quin was dying at Bath, he said: "I could wish that the last tragic scene were over, and I hope I may be enabled to meet and pass through it with dignity." On Garrick, that actor who had played a hundred characters, and had originated thirty, that last scene had now opened. Regret, sorrow, and gratitude, were struggling in his heart.

On the 10th of June 1776, Garrick appeared for the last time as Don Felix in the comedy of the Wonder. He had wished to close with Richard the Third, his first great triumph; but he had considered that after the nervous tent-scene, and the rage and passion of the battle, he should be worth nothing, and might be too fatigued to utter his farewell. He braced himself up to be once more dazzling, vivacious, airy, gallant, and witty. He resolved to show himself as if passed through Medea's caldron, again young and vigerous. Garrick's thrift had been cruelly ridiculed by Foote and other heartless wits as the basest stinginess. His last public act, however, was a work of charity. He had always been a generous rival and a kind manager. He now wished to enforce on a thoughtless and somewhat reckless race the necessity of providing for the poor straggler from the ranks, and for the defeated and beaten down in life's long and tough battle. A fund for old and infirm actors had been incorporated at Drury Lane by his exertions; he had also provided an annual benefit to help forward the charity. He now announced that the profits of his last night were to go to this admirable fund. His prologue on this occasion was admirably neat, full of humor, and contained many happy allusions to the motely contrasts of theatrical life.

Garrick delivered it gaily, and with the true point and sparkle, and then went through his part of Don Felix with great humor and assumed vivacity. Now came the awful moment that was to extinguish at once the sunshine of thirty years of public favor. He had now to close down over his own head the lid of his own coffin. The pleasure, pride, and hope of his life had been his success upon the stage upon which he was now about to turn his reluctant back. He had had the good sense to feel that verse would be too restricting a vehicle for his feelings of sorrow, and with his fine sensitive countenance quivering with unfeigned emotion, he advanced and addressed the audience in these simple but touching words:

"Ladies and Gentlemen—It has been customary with persons under my circumstances to address you in a farewell epilogue. I had the same intention, and turned my thoughts that way; but I found myself then as incapable of writing such an epilogue, as I should be now of speaking. The jingle of rhyme and the language of fiction would but ill suit my present feelings. This is to me a very awful moment: it is no less than parting forever with those from whom I have received the greatest kindness, and upon the spot where that kindness and your favors were enjoyed. [Here his voice failed him; he paused till a gush of tears relieved him.] Whatever may be the changes of my future life, the deepest impression of your kindness will always remain here—here, in my heart, fixed and unutterable. I will readily agree to my successors having more skill and ability for their station than I have had; but I defy them all to take more uninterrupted pains for your favor, or to be more truly sensible of it, than is your grateful humble servant."

Having uttered these sentiment, he bowed respectfully to all parts of the house, and at a slow pace, and with much hesitation, withdrew forever from the presence of the town.

The audience felt what it was losing, and was reluctant to part—parting is such sweet sorrow. They felt, as Dr. Browne had written, that his great genius had dignified the stage, had "restored it to the fulness of its ancient splendor, and with a variety of powers beyond example established nature—Shakspeare and himself. The gaiety of the nation, as Johnson said, was eclipsed by his exit. Men were seeing and hearing, for the last time, what Smollett had praised:

"The sweetness and variety of tones, the irresistible magic of his eyo, the fire and vivacity of his action, the elegance of attitudes, and the whole pathos of cxpression."

Every face in the theatre was clonded with grief, tears were bursting from many eyes and rolling down many cheeks. The sorrow was electric, and spread from heart to heart. The cry of "Farewell" resounded from box to box, and seat to seat, till it became a mighty agitated clamor like the moan of a troubled ocean. A sun had gone down after a day of changeless lustre; the end of the theatrical world seemed come.

Garrick soon after signed the deeds for the sale of half his patent to Sheridan, Ford and Lindley, and retired to his pretty and tranquil villa at Hampton. He died on January 20, 1779, at his house, No. 5, Adelphi-terrace. He was buried grandly in the Abbey— a fitting place for the grave of so wonderful a man. Years afterwards, Dr. Johnson and Boswell were one evening, in the summer evening stillness, looking over the rails of Adelphi-terrace at the Thames flowing below them, dark, silent, and mysterious as Lethe. After an interval of thoughful silence, Boswell said:

"I was thinking just then of two friends we have lost, who once lived in the buildings behind us. Topham Beauclerk, and Garrick."

„Ay, sir," said the great man, tenderly, "and two such friends can never be supplied."

It is hard, almost impossible, to decide now whether Garrick was the greatest actor that had appeared up to his own time. Quin was too heavy and deliberate to be compared with him. But Betterton must have been a great genius to have so fascinated Steele, and to have won the highest eulogies of a clever and sagacious observer of such experience as Cibber. His agony as Othello, his graceful energy in the speech to the senate, the reverential love with which as Hamlet he addressed the Ghost, seem to have almost transcended any effort of Garrick's; but then Betterton was probably as much too oratorical and conventional as Kemble seemed to be beside Edmund Kean, or as Quin himself beside Garrick. The man, too, who used to play Macbeth in brown velvet court-dress must have had a different ideal to our own more naturalistic school, or he would have felt the outrageousness of such a convention.

Perhaps, after all, it is by a résumé of Garrick anecdotes that we got the best idea of the great actor. One of his most extraordinary powers seemed to have been the instantaneous quickness with which he could assume any character, or pass from tears to laughter. Betterton when dressed for Lear, remained Lear, and took his wine at the side-scenes with the gravity of a monarch. Garrick would rise from the side of dead Cordelia, skip into the green-room, and gobble like a turkey-cock to amuse Peg Woffington or Mrs. Clive. He played the dagger-scene in ordinary dress to please Grimm, and the room, full of German critics, burst into involuntary shouts of applause. The next moment he was giving them a pastrycook's boy who has let a tray of tartlets fall in the gutter, and is at first stupified, then noisy in his blubbering. We all know the story of the Garrick fever, a fresh epidemic that he caused by his crowded houses. The proverb still extant, of "clever as Garrick," speaks loudly, too, for his genius and his fame. He astonished Hogarth by assuming the face of Fielding, of whom no portrait existed. In Paris once, he nearly frightened the driver of a fiacre into fits by getting in at one door in the dusk, getting out at the other, and returning to get in each time with a new face and walk. When he and Preville, the French actor, both competed which could feign drunkenness the better while riding, Garrick carried off the bell, in the opinion of every one, by showing that Preville was fairly drunk everywhere except his legs, but that they remained stolidly sober. When he sat to Carmontelle for the picture of the comic Garrick watching the tragic Garrick, he kept up an incessant facial change from wild joy to sadness, terror, rage, anguish, and dispair. Like his friend Hogarth, he was a great student of street faces. One night during a fierce parliamentary debate in the year 1777, an angry member, catching the sight of Garrick's droll watchful face, moved that the gallery should be cleared. Burke instantly sprang up like a rocket, and pleaded for the great master of eloquence, from whom he derived many of the graces of oratory. Black-browned Fox and dexterous Townshend followed, and also claimed Garrick as their preceptor. He was instantly excepted from the general order, and remained in the gallery, pleased and triumphant, to infinite vexation of the honorable gentleman who had moved his expulsion. These stories, and such as these, prove how deep an impression Garrick's genius made in the minds of even the greatest men of his era.

II.—MRS. SIDDONS.

That great tragic actress, Mrs. Siddons, the daughter of a strolling manager who had originally been hairdresser to the company, made her first appearence on the stage almost as soon as she could speak. Lord Ailesbury and Lady Boyle patronised her at Cheltham soon after her marriage, and mentioned her to Garrick, who gave her an engagement at five pounds per week. She was young, fragile, and timid then, and Garrick never cared much about her. He told her her arms moved awkwardly, and she declared "that he was afraid she would overshadow his nose." Mrs. Abington, however, asserted her genius, and she soon afterwards went to Bath. Henderson praised her there, and her triumph began. In 1782 she came to London, and astonished the town as Isabella in Southern's play. From that moment her fame began. When she played Jane Shore, the ladies sobbed and shrieked; the men wept, and fainting fits were of momentary occurrence in the boxes. Her Calista and Belvidera touched every heart. When she played Mrs. Beverley, in the Gamester, the pit used to curse and threaten and yell at the wicked Stukeley, and people afraid of the excitement have been known to stay in the lobby and look in at the square glasses of the box doors, so as not to hear the words, but only see the wonderful face. Once, when she played Agnes in the Fatal Curiosity, a gentleman in the pit went into hysterics. In the fainting scene in Tamerlane, she was once so deeply moved that she really swooned. Whether as Lady Macbeth, Cordelia Volumnia, or Queen Katharine, she was always classical, majestic, graceful, sublime, inspired.

In 1812 this great actress took her farewell of the stage. She had for some time been wishing to realize ten thousand pounds, and escape the fatigues of her profession. Latterly her enunciation had grown slow, her straining for effect too visible. Yet there were regets that she whispered to herself and bosom friends. To Mrs. Piozzi she said:

"This last season of my acting I feel as if I were mounting the first step of a ladder conducting me to the other world."

She did her best, however, to make her sunset a tropical one; for she performed fifty-seven times in her last season, and in fourteen favorite characters: Lady Macbeth, Mrs. Beverley, Lady Constance, Elvira, Euphrasia, Queen Katharine, Isabella (Fatal Marriage), Isabella (Measure for Measure), Belvidera, Hermione, Volumina, and Mrs. Haller.

She chose for her final play Macbeth; the Thane's dark and dangerous wife being one of her greatest triumphs, although play-goers asserted that Mrs. Pritchard had had more dignity and more compass, strength, and melody of voice. In the sleeping-scene the older critics claimed for Mrs. Pritchard sighs of deeper agony, and a voice more sleepy and more articulate. Yet was her acting divine. She moved like a prophetess; her beautiful face was the interpreter of a noble mind. She moved like a queen, and spoke like a Pythoness. As Hazlitt says finely: "The enthusiasm she excited had something idolatrous about it. We can conceive nothing grander. She embodied, to our imagination, the fables of mythology of the heroic and deified mortals of elder time. She was not less than a goddess, or than a prophetess inspired by the gods. Power was seated on her brow, passion radiated from her breast as from a shrine. She was Tragedy personified." The public was gazing for the last time on her who, as Campbell said, had "increased the heart's capacity for tender, intense, and lofty feelings."

On the farewell night, her old inspiration seemed to have returned. She was supernatural from the moment she instilled into the chieftain's ear the poisonous thought of evil till the time when, a mere wreck of remorse and disappointed ambition, a miserable queen, she moved like a phantom of the night, muttering fragments of her deams all pervaded by the one racking thought. Her eyes were open, but they were consciousless and blank. The soul was absent, and in torture. When she rubbed her thin white hands in horrible remembrance of the blood that had once bathed them, the house shuddered with an ague fit of horror and of pity.

At the close of this scene the applause was frantic and ungovernable. Many persons stood upon the benches and, dreading an anti-climax, shouted requests that the performance might close when Mrs. Siddons left the stage. An actor then came forward and at once promised that this should be complied with.

The curtain was dropped for twenty minutes, then rose, and discovered Mrs. Siddons dressed simply in white, sitting at a table. She came forward through a tornado of applause, which prevented her speaking for some time. When the lull spread, she moved forward in her own queenly way, and delivered the following address, written forher by her nephew, Mr. Horace Twiss:

Who has not felt, how growing use endears
The fond remembrance of our former years?
Who has not sighed, when doom'd to leave at last
The hopes of youth, the habits of the past,
The thousand ties and interests, that impart
A second nature to the human heart,
And, wreathing round it close, like tendrils, climb
Blooming in age, and sanctified by time?

Yes! at this moment crowd upon my mind
Scenes of bright days for ever left behind,
Bewildering visions of enraptured youth,
When hope and fancy wore the hues of truth,
And long-forgotten years, that almost seem
The faded traces of a morning dream!
Sweet are those mournful thoughts: for they renew
The pleasing sense of all I owe to you,
For each inspiring smile, and soothing tear—
For those full honors of my long career,
That cheer'd my earliest hope, and chased my latest fear!

And though, for me, those tears shall flow no more,
And the warm sunshine of your smile is o'er—
Though the bright beams are fading fast away
That shone unclouded through my summer day—
Yet, grateful Memory shall reflect their light,
O'er the dim shadows of the coming night,
And lend the later life a softer tone,
A moonlight tint—a lustre of her own.

Judges and friends! to whom the magic strain
Of Nature's feeling never spoke in vain,
Perhaps your hearts, when years have glided by,
And past emotions wake a fleeting sigh,
May think on her, whose lips have pour'd so long
The charmed sorrows of your Shakspeare's song:—
On her, who parting to return no more,
Is now the mourner she but seem'd before—
Herself subdued, resigns the melting spell,
And breathes with swelling heart, her long, her last Farewell!

Toward the close of the address Mrs. Siddons became much agitated, and when, after some pauses, it ended, Kemble, in his grand Roman way, came and led his sister from the stage amid whirlwinds of applause.

Poor Mrs. Siddons! She had had a grand career of almost unalloyed triumph; but still calumny had often stung her. The misdoings of a bad sister, who had read lectures at Dr. Graham's quack Temple of Health, and afterwards tried to poison herself in Westminster Abbey, were all laid at her door. She was also accused of mean thrift, and of allowing her old father to become a petitioner for alms.

These slanders were, we have every reason to believe, utterly untrue. Mrs. Siddons, to judge from her letters, and the accounts of her intimate friends, seems to have been a high-minded, prudent, self-respecting woman, uninflated by her extraordinary fame, and the high society into which it had led her. After gala days at countesses, where lords and ladies elbowed each other, and stood on chairs in their anxiety to see her, she returned, calm, dignified, and contented, to her home in Gower street. It might have turned even the wisest woman's head to have Reynolds painting his name on the hem of her garment as the Tragic Muse, and Dr. Johnson calling her "a glorious woman—a prodigiously fine woman, who on the stage was adorned by nature and glorified by art."

As even the sun has spots, so there are certain deductions, however, to be made for even such a fame as that of the Siddons. Mrs. Crawford equalled her as Lady Randolph. Mrs. Cibber rivalled her in Zara. She did little as Juliet. She spoiled Rosalind by prudish scruples about the pretty fantastic male dress necessary to the part. Mrs. Jordan was far more charming in that charming character. Mrs. Cibber surpassed the Siddons as Ophelia. In love she was too solemn, in comedy too heavy. Her Lady Townley wanted airiness; her Lady in Comus, her Katharine, Portia, and Cleone, were by no means successes.

The Siddons' face, though grandly grave and Grecian, was rather too Jewish and prononcée in the nose and chin; the action of her arms dissatisfied even to the last hypercritical men with a difficult taste, like Horace Walpole. In domestic life she retained a certain stiff, tragic manner, which had become habitual with her, as with her brother, John Philip. She stabbed the potatoes at dinner, and said regally and metrically to the servants:

I asked for water, and you gave me beer.

But a great genius left the stage when the dark green curtain fell for the last time on the majestic figure and face of Sarah Siddons.

MENTAL LABOR AND DIGESTION.—Mental labor is not in itself likely to interfere with digestion. In fact, he who has the largest and most active brain ought to have the easiest and best digestion, other things being equal. It is not brain-work, but brain-worry that interferes with the activity of the stomach. The action of the pneumo-gastric nerve, by which the nerve-force is carried from the brain to the stomach, is not influenced to a morbid degree by intellectual activity; but it is materially and injuriously influenced by emotional agitation —fretting. Thus, any disagreeable mental impression, shortly after eating, is calculated to retard digestion, and if prolonged, to prevent its thorough accomplishment. A prominent and popular writer on physiology says:

"It is worthy of remark, that mere intellectual activity, when unaccompanied by agitating emotion, never seems to affect the digestion, unless the effort be of unusual intensity. Our passions are devouring flames. Anger, Ambition, Envy, Despair, Sorrow, and even Joy disturb the digestion." * *

When a friend is overwhelmed with grief, we try to force him gently to take the food he so obstinately refuses. Perhaps our entreaties succeed: he takes a little food "as a support." Error! the food will weaken, not strengthen him. In such cases, Instinct may be safely relied on. When a man is hungry, he will eat. When he will not eat, he should be left in peace till hunger prompts.

GOOD MANNERS.—Good manners are the blossoms of good sense, and, it may be added, of good feeling too; for if the law of kindness be written in the heart, it will lead to that disinterestedness in little as well as in great things—that desire to oblige, and attention to the gratification of others, which is the foundation of good manners.

GREEK WOMEN.—According to "Pashley's Travels in Crete," no women of the island ever sings. And the Sfakian women, whose seclusion and reserve is greater than the other female Cretans, never even dance except on some great religious festival, and then only with very near relations.

LITERARY GLEANINGS.

RUSKIN ON "CONSTANT ART."

THE London correspondent of the New York Tribune has furnished that paper with a synopsis of a lecture recently delivered by John Ruskin at the Royal Institution, on the present condition of art. The lecturer thought that the art of the present day was much injured by a straining after originality corrupted by isolation. There were painfully powerful displays of dexterity. If an artist has a fault he is as apt as not to consider it his excellence, and to fight for his fault. Another bad characteristic is the perpetual introduction of dramatic effects. Art may be divided into Constant Art and Dramatic Art. Constant Art dwells not upon what a person or thing is now doing, but what they are. The greatest artists, even when dramatic movement is introduced, make it as slight as possible; all that the great Apollo does is to kill a lizzard. They make their hero's movement suggest greater reserved power than is put forth in any art. As an example of this he exhibited Holbien's "St. Michael slaying the Dragon." But there is a tendency in Art now-a-days to simply tell a story. This was in concession to a public which could not enjoy beautiful forms but could enjoy a good story. But nothing that a person is momentarily doing is of any importance compared with the permanent character of that person. For one who can paint a beautiful form there are ten who can paint a pleasant story, and ten times ten who can paint an unpleasant one. This is why our Art is so ephemeral. People do not want to hear the same story over and over, and so the new picture passes away with the new novel. Mr. Ruskin then showed that as ancient Art began to emphasize the dramatic element instead of form and color, it declined, and at last became vapid. All that was valuable in modern art was a movement against this vapidity. At the head of these reformers he placed Dante Gabriel Rossetti.

HIS ESTIMATE OF GUSTAVE DORE.

The lecturer showed some grotesque figures by Doré, of whom he spoke with great contempt, and said that it was a sad symptom that Burnard Jones should have been almost derided while the British public called for Dore to illustrate its Bible. This wretchedness of the public taste rendered it impossible that high English art should exist at present, and as a national art must be produced from a nation's inner life, the real school of Art must for a long time be our streets—our chief designs to make the people clean within and without. Baptism is the great sacrament to save the poor just now; and when the rich were inwardly baptized, the poor would be outwardly cleansed.

ARTISTS AND EXHIBITIONS.

Mr. Ruskin then treated of schools of Art, exhibitions, and the national galleries. He considered exhibitions as having a bad effect on Art. The line of Keats which had been placed over the Manchester Exhibition—"A thing of beauty is a joy forever"—was really a satire. It did not say that a thing of beauty was a joy for three days, limited by the duration of a return ticket. He would not say that the best artists would not paint for exhibitions; but, so far as exhibitions influenced their work, that work would be ephemeral like the novels and the bonnets. There should be three classes of institutions: 1. Places of Amusement; 2. Schools of Art; 3. Treasuries of Art. The works of God should be exhibited at the British Museum; the works of man in a National Gallery, which should contain two departments—one to exhibit beautiful works of the people; the other a treasury of the most perfect works for persons who have real reasons for and ability to study them. These last should be properly surrounded. He spoke of a Turner ("On the Castle") at South Kensington, so surrounded that he never could get anybody to look at it except by dragging them up to it; and yet it was a whole school of Art in itself. He described glowingly an ideal National Gallery—a simple and grand building, not unsumptuous, especially precious in material, which should have three stories—the lower for sculpture, the second for paintings, the upper for small articles, miniatures, coins, etc., which required much light. It should stretch from Westminster to Vauxhall—now a long nuisance. Let the Penitentiary be pulled down, and let one year's expenditure for gunpowder or fireworks be given for that great work. Is the end of English life to be gasometers and penitentiaries? if so, all our public institutions will turn to gasometers, and every home be a penitentiary.

AN ODD EPISODE.

At one point in the lecture, an interruption occurred which is probably without a precedent in the annals of the Royal Institution, whose audiences are supposed to be the creme de la creme.

"An old gentleman, who had probably taken something stronger than cream, had now and then been giving vent to his feelings by ejaculating, 'Quite right,' 'That's so,' and now he began to talk so continuously that Ruskin had to stop. There were calls that 'that gentleman should be put out,' and Mr. Bence Jones and Prof. Tyndall, long known for their skill in drawing people to the Royal, proceeded to the novel experience of expelling one. They went to him and Tyndall said mildly, 'Come, friend, leave' 'I beg your pardon,' replied the old gentleman, with a good humor that made the audience roar, 'I've come to hear Ruskin. I'll sit here.' Then Tyndall, with a decision that should be rehearsed in a epic, took hold of an arm, and Jones of a leg, and the man vanished. T. and J. presently appeared near the lecturer, very warm, and were greeted with loud cheers.

AN ENGLISH DEMOCRAT.

It seems not a little odd, with our preconceived notions, to come across such a vigorous counterblast against aristocracy and hereditary caste as the following, in an English journal. It is from Public Opinion.

"Is it not painful to see our middle classes training up their children to pay the most abject deference to power, wealth, and rank—to see sensible, intelligent, highly educated men and women bowing, and speaking with bated breath, in presence of—not a great, but a little man usurping a great man's place, and trying to fancy himself what he is not, and never can be; to see an individual tricked out in velvet, ermine, stars and garters, possessed of legislative power, enormous social influence, titles, land, wealth, not because he himself is intellectual or moral, but because his great, great, great grandfather did or did not do some service to the State? It is time to protest against this melancholy and mischievous prejudice in favor of hereditary honors—antagonistic to national progress, tainting our whole social condition. Just in as far as we are able to emancipate ourselves from the thraldom of its influence, are we strong and successful individually and nationally. Look at the United States of America and the other colonies planted by the Anglo-Saxon. Their rapid growth and thriving condition may be mainly attributed to the fact that, having outgrown the ridiculous mediæval institutions of hereditary caste still cherished by John Bull, they reproduce the British Constitution only to a certain point. Might not the mother country take a lesson from her prosperous children? Is Britannia too old, too proud, too foolish, too imbecile to take a hint from the clever young housewives, her daughters Misses Canada, Australia, New Zealand, etc.? Try the hereditary principle by its application to practical, every day affairs of life. A great general wins one of the decisive battles of the world. His grateful country makes him a duke, a field marshal, and showers honor upon him in the shape of pensions and estates. Most of these rewards go to his eldest son, but the nation is not so mad as to put the son in command of the army. The patent of nobility, the substantial rewards of greatness are hereditary, but the military genius, that very quality which obtained these rewards, dies with the original possessor. The son of a great captain or admiral may not be fit to command a company or a cutter, but he is fit to legislate for and to beget legislators for Great Britain!"

As a specimen of the quaint, sweet old-English manner, nothing can be finer than the following, from Jean Ingelow's last volume:

A MORN OF MAY.

All the clouds about the sun lay up in golden creases,
(Merry rings the maiden's voice that sings at dawn of day;)
Lambkins woke and skipped around to dry their dewy fleeces,
So sweetly as she carolled, all on a morn of May.

Quoth the Sergeant, "Here I'll halt; here's wine of joy for drinking;
To my heart she sets her head, and in the strings doth play;
All among the daffodills, and fairer to my thinking,
And, fresh as milk and roses, she sits this morn of May."

Quoth the Sergeant, "Work is work, but any ye might make me,
If I worked for you, dear lass, I'd count my holiday.
I'm your slave for good and all, an' if ye will but take me,
So sweetly as you carol upon this morn of May."

"Medals count for worth," quoth she, "and scars are worn for honor;
But a slave an' if ye be, kind wooer, go your way."
All the nodding daffodils woke up and laughed upon her.
O, sweetly did she carol, all on that morn of May.

Gladsome leaves upon the bough, they fluttered fast and faster,
Fretting brook, till he would speak, did chide the dull delay;
Beauty! when I said a slave I think I meant a master;
So sweetly as we carol all on this morn of May.

"Lass, I love you! Love is strong, and some men's hearts are tender."
Far she sought o'er wood and wold, but found not aught to say;
Mounting lark nor mantling cloud would any counsel render,
Though sweetly she had carolled upon that morn of May.

Shy, she sought the wooer's face, and deemed the wooing mended;
Proper man he was, good sooth, and one would have his way;
So the lass was made a wife, and so the song was ended,
O, sweetly she did carol all on that morn of May.

EMERSON TO THE PHI BETA KAPPAS.

The last annual oration before the Phi Beta Kappa Society, was delivered by Ralph Waldo Emerson, at the Havard. It is a highly characteristic production, and abounds in striking passages. The following is the conclusion:

Yours, gentlemen, yours, brethren, is the part of those who have received much; it is yours to remember that motto of a just man, noblesse oblige; that superior advantages bind one to greater generosity. Here are the lame, the blind and the deaf; here are the enemies to be punished and converted. Opposition is to be overcome, difficulties are to be surmounted. The great heart will no more complain of the obstructions that make success difficult than of the iron walls of the gun which hinder the shot from scattering. The vigorous soul hates success without effort. It is not the great who are tender at being obscure, despised or insulted. Strong men like hard times. They wish, as Pinder said, to trend the floors of hell on necessities as hard as iron. Periodicity, recuperative forces, reaction—these are the allies that help us. In England it is the "game-laws" which exasperate the farms and carry the Reform bill; it was plantation manners that drove on our country to emancipation. The community of scholars do not, I fear, know their power. They weaken each other by the toleration of political baseness around them. Where good society exists, it is very well able to exclude pretenders. They quickly find themselves uncomfortable, and depart to their gang. Our politicians have had a bad effect upon character. We have allowed our young men of ambition to play the game of politics, to follow the example set them without rebuke.

But that kind of association does not leave a person his own master. He cannot come and go from the good to the evil at pleasure, and then back again to the good. There is a text in Swedenborg which tells in a figure the plan in the lower regions. A man saw, in vision, the angles and the devils in Heaven; "but these stood not face to face, and hands to hands, but feet to feet—those perpendicular up, and these perpendicular down." Gentlemen, I believe and I hope, from the tone of public sentiment to-day, from the healthy judgment and the healthy sympathy of the American people, and from the educated class, that we shall be saved from the errors which have resulted to France and England from the repudiation of the moral sentiment. In England the want of spirituality in the upper classes, in the time of Charles II., and down through the Georges, had a disastrous effect; but it honorably distinguishes the educated classes here that men believe in the power of the moral sentiment to succor the intellect and to draw greatness from its experience. When I say the "educated classes," I know what a meaning that has, reaching millions here instead of hundreds. And, looking around me, I see what sound material the educated class here is made of—what virtue, what affection, what hope is joined with such greatness of learning and practical power—and that the cause of science and learning is in the hands of educated benefactors. I cannot but believe that this class is to have its effect in the time to come. I think their hands are safe enough to hold up the Republic, and I see in their faces the promise of better times and greater men.

FIRE INSURANCE.

THE subject of Fire Insurance is one over which there has been much local excitement of late. This excitement is principally due to the fact that the Board of Underwriters of this city had their monopoly of the business broken up a little over a year ago, and all the rules and rates which they laid upon the backs of issuers were scattered. This state of affairs was brought about by the establishment of a Company which the Board attempted in every way possible to crush—both by excluding it from partnership and other opposition. Within the past fortnight long rows of figures and long columns of parti-reasoning about the late increase of fire and unprofitableness of the insurance business, (through this increase and the taking of risks at what are called unjustifiably low rates,) have appeared in the papers. All of these troubles are easily and apparently satisfactorily accounted for by being laid at the door of the one offending Company. It is charged with taking risks at too low rates—with insuring property at more than it should be insured for—with settling claims against it too readily. In fact, in every way it is loudly charged with being a thorn in the side of the insurance business, and the companies complaining hold out for their inspection of the public returns, which show their business and their profits to be wofully declining, and laying, as we have said, their many troubles at the door of one offender, almost whine to our citizens not to patronize it. The answer filed by the offending company is brief and incisive. It admits the offence charged, of having transferred to its books the business formerly enjoyed by a monopoly. It admit taking risks at lower rates than those formerly charged, but emphatically asserts that this difference is far more than made up to it by the press of business it enjoys through public favor, and keeping do nothing but pompous drones, on high salaries, out of its establishment. It admits also the virtue—which has been charged as a crime—of prompt settlement with those whose policies have become payable through disaster by fire, but utterly denies that it has ever paid a dime to a party upon whom even the slightest suspicion of incendiarism hung—and not simply asks, but demands, that those who have been making indefinite and malicious charges to the contray, shall come down to a solitary, substantinting fact.

It asserts that it does not attempt to force those who have been burned out to compromise with one-third or one-half of what they are entitled to by unjustly charging incendiarism and threatening lawsuits. Entire freedom from the latter it asserts is one of the main planks of its success. Instead of feeing a high-feed lawyer in its employ as a sort of terror to those who demand their dues when a fire occurs, the rule of arbitration by two unprejudiced witnesses is the simple and just rule adopted, and quibbles to escape incurred obligations are never attempted to be set up These are the crimes of the offending companies, and by the practice of them it pays higher dividends to stockholders and makes their stock more valuable than any other in the market, while it has, in addition, not only had kind and cheering words for every deserving institution in the city, but what is more practical, it has ministered to them a generous share of the profits which public favor has enabled them to reap. And in its hold upon the latter lies all its transgressions. It has got the public to believe in it, and there it is attacked. If its establishment had been a failure; if it had not broken up the extortionate profits and taken away the business of the old companies, the latter would now be treating it with the contempt which they indulged in when it was established; and would not labor so hard as they are doing by misstatements and malice to regain that which they have irretrievably lost. We regret not being able to offer a balm to the injured pockets and feelings of the companies lately united in the Board of Underwriters; but we can at least give them a word of advice: Stop wasting time and ink intruding upon public patience by dry retailing of your grievances, and in what you know to be unjust charges against those who have only incurred your enmity because they have displayed greater knowledge of the business of which you foolishly thought yourselves the masters and monopolists. If the insurance business has taken to itself wings and flown away from you, surely there are on this coast other occupations in which you may more profitably engage your time than in spending it as you are doing in useless whining after that which your past exactions have caused you to lose forever.

FIVE YEARS IN JAPAN.

BY FORBES MAITLAND.

No. III.

THE manners and customs of a country which has for so many centuries obstinately cut itself off from the more progressive peoples of the Western world, a nation which is now in the same position as when Rome and Greece were in their glory; having neither progressed nor retrograded since that period must necessarily be peculiar and strange.

This Rip Van Winkle nation suddenly awakes after a long sleep and gazes with astonishment on the world. To the countries of the Western hemisphere, it presents a most interesting spectacle, and the fact that the newly-opened intercourse between it and America and Europe must materially modify the habits of the imitative and knowledge-seeking Japanese, renders some account of the peculiarities which at present distinguish them the more interesting.

The Japanese are essentially a religious people, therefore a description of their practice of the worship of Buddah must necessarialy occupy a prominent place in an account of their daily life.

Baddism is the most popular religion in Japan, having over thirty-five millions of followers, or almost two thirds of the entire populatiou. There are two very fine Buddist temples within an easy ride of Yokohama; one at Kowasaki, a long, straggling village about eight miles from Yokohama, and situated close to the river Logo. This is called "Dise," and is reputed to be one of the finest, if not tho finest, temple in Japan. Hero the Tycoon offers up his prayers when he is passing either to or from Miako, which, of course, makes it additionally sacred in the eyes of the Japanese.

On first visiting a Japanese temple one cannot but be struck with the neatness and cleanliness of all the surrounding grounds. They are very different from a Chiuese "Joss House," where all is filth and decay, from the miscrable swarm of, I was going to say half-clothed, but I must reduce it to one eighth clad, armless, legless, and clephantiasised beggers who aro continually lying about the gates, the yelping pack of half-starved curs, and the almost as miserable looking priest, who seem only waiting until some other padre comes along to give up his position and the ghost at one and the same time. What a contrast does it present on entering the temple of Dise, or, indeed, any Japanese temple: here everything is quiet and orderly; one might, in fact, be in a European place of worship; there is a high stone wall built completely round the temple, or rather temples, for there are some four or five, of minor importance, inside the square; outside this wall again, is a deep moat, thus completely securing the inmates against any intrusion unless through the legitimate gate, at which there is a continual guard kept, by officers appointed by government for that express service.

With common politeness, (which, I am sorry to say, is not at all times practised) however, one has no difficulty in not only gaining admittance, but in being shown every nook and corner, and that, too, in a manner which, for politeness, might put to shame many an elegant of our own country. I shall not soon forget the jolly, fat, good-natured Bonz (priest) who showed me the wonders on my first visit; he seemed so pleased with my being able to converse in his own language, and, seeing my evident verdure, was so particular to pronounce each word distinctly, so that I might have the less difficulty in understanding him.

After having requested, and been granted permission to inspect the interior, you are requested in the most polite manner to give your horses in charge to the "Bettos" (grooms) who are always in waiting to take care of the horses of visitors, either natives or foreign. On first entering the gate I was struck by the intense stillness; not a sound was to be heard, except the shuffling noise of some priest passing along in his straw sandals. Suddenly the sweetest of voices met my ear and said, as only a Japanese "mousmie" (girl) can say "Danna San dozo sko she cha no-me-mas," which in the plain vernacular, only means after all, 'Master, or, sir will you please take a little tea.' I looked, and beheld the prettiest little face, and the neatest little figure I had seen for many a day. I was charmed by the pleasant and graceful manner in which she handed me the cup (I might say thimble) of tea. After having drunk my tea, and admired my fair attendant for a time I prepared to commence my tour of inspection, but not yet. I was requested as a particular favor to remove my riding boots. That was more easily said than done, for I must confess to being partial to a tight fitting boot; however, after the Ku-skee (servant) had hauled and tugged at my unfortunate pedals for nearly two hours, and that, too, with the themometer at somewhere about 100 in the shade, he succeeded in removing the obnoxious boots, and left me almost in a state of collapse. After another cup of tea, and a pull at something stronger, I felt able to proceed having duly incased my feet in a pair of Japanese sandals, which, by the way, after I got accustomed to them, I found extremely comfortable. We first visited the minor temples; here are heard the smaller detitious such as the case of a young lady having fallen violently in love with a young gentleman; here the love-sick maiden comes, and goes at it hammer and tongs on her marrow bones for, say a week, each day passing in her offering to this particular god. At the end of that time, however, should the young man prove alike invulnerable to her prayers as he had previously done to her sighs, she quietly gives him up and tries another. There also may be found the god especially set apart for those who wish to renew their youth. I observed this venerable gentleman drove a rousing trade. The large amount of business transacted in this department was easily seen from the size of the pile of copper cash in front of the deity. If he could only be transported to San Francisco what a run he would have! I am afraid, however, he would require to be in duplicate, as I am confident one image could never pass on all the supplications which would be laid before him, and I question if the two could manage the business if they were members of the "Eight Hour League." Within these five smaller temples can be found an image who will attend to any business, let that business be ever so trifling. We will now pay a visit to the principal temple where the great "Dise" himself presides over affairs. He is, however, entirely in the heavy business, no small petition is passed through his hands to the far spirit land. In fact, it is reported—for this, however, I will not vouch—that the old gentleman will touch nothing under an attempt at rebellion. On either side of the "Dise" are hung two large oval mirrors around the frames of which are written in Japanese characters that well-known maxim made so popular with the citizens of San Francisco through its constant reiteration in the advertisements of the Anatomical Museum, "Man know thyself." This fact proves conclusively that the remark did originate with Pope. In front are six magnificent candellabra of pure gold. "Dise" himself is got up in most gorgeous stylo, and at the same time with considerable taste. Tho altar-cloth is a magnificent piece of workmanship, and would do credit to any Parisian manufacturer. It consists of the most beautiful embroidered silk, on which is represented in glowing colors the sacred bird, the stork, and the no less sacred mountain Fusi Yama. The floor is covered with the softest and whitest of matting. Here the worshipers can also have their fortunes told by an aged priest in the most simple and speedy manner possible, and for tho reasonable charge of two tempos, or five cents. Behind a rail, about fifteen inches high, is seated, or rather squatted, tailor fashion, the Professor Cohen of "Dise," who, on your handing him the requisite amount, takes a small oblong box with a hole in one end, gives it one or two vigorous shakes, and ejects a small slip of wood with a number on it; he then refers to a corresponding number in a pigeon hole, and draws forth your fortune. I tried my luck three times in succession, and finding them different each time, gave it up in disgust. In the centre of the square is what is reported to be the finest and oldest bell in Japan; it is certainly the largest I ever saw, either in Japan or anywhere else, and its tone is exquisite. The Japanese say it can be heard a distance of four "ree," or nearly nine miles; never having heard it sounded I cannot guarantee the truth of this statement. On the left of the courtyard as you leave is the private entrance of the Tycoon; this being considered in a manner sacred, and my friend, the "Bonz," not offering to do so, I did not request to be shown this but prepared to take my departure through the common gate. This, however, I was not allowed to do until I had again partaken of the worthy priest's hospitality, in the shape of tea and cake.

Within a short distance of the temple is a small stream, on the banks of which you will invariably find one or more government, or rather licensed beggars who are certain to importune you for a tempo to try if you are in luck on that particular day. Each man has a tub containing small eels from which you pick out a dozen and throw them into the holy stream; you then watch which way the majority swim; should a majority go up you are in good luck and may try anything, it will be sure to prove a success; on the other hand should they go down you are equally sure to fail in all you undertake on that day. The Japanese believe in this so firmly that no power on earth could shake their faith, or induce them to enter into any speculation of however trifling a nature, after they have tried the Fates in this manner and found them unpropitious. These beggars are a peculiar class; they are a sort of a cross between a pauper and a priest. They gain permission to become so from having made the pilgrimage from either Meako or Yeddo to the top of Fusi Yama. On the side of the mountain are built a number of temples, at the first of which, after having shown his credentials, and proved himself a bona fide pilgrim, the devotee obtains a long white robe, similiar to that worn by the regular priests, first, however, having had his head clean shaven: having gone through these little preliminaries, he receives the stamp of Temple Number One on the back of his robe, and off he is started. He must call, pray, offer sacrifice and get duly stamped at each and every temple, (and there are about one hundred) until he reaches the top, going through the same routine on the return trip; the consequence is that ere he gets to the last his robe presents a most peculiar aspect, covered as it is with two hundred stamps of all colors, sizes and shapes. This pilgrimage business may be beneficial to their souls, but as to its effect on the outward man, I must say it appears to be rather rough, to say the least of it. This robe now serves as a passport to them all over Japan; (and to heaven also, if one may believe the Japanese). They can enter any city without being asked a single question, and start into their business—that of a beggar or wandering priest—in fact, they have equally as many privileges as the first Damio (prince) in the land so far as traveling is concerned.

To-night, Geo. M. Ciprico, the Manager of the Occidental Theatrical Club, will be the recipient of a benefit, tendered him by the members of the Club, and many citizens of San Francisco. Hamlet will be performed at the Academy of Music, by members of the Club, the beneficiary assuming the role of the Prince of Denmark, which he played sometime since at Turn Verein Hall, before a large and fashionable audience. The cast will be nearly the same as on that occasion; Miss Jennie Parker will be substituted for Mrs. Ludlum in the role of "Ophelia," and Charles Cosgrove will play "Polonius," instead of the gentleman who made a "mull" of the character at Turn Verein Hall.

THE SHRIEVALTY.

Of the various county offices, that of Sheriff is unquestionably one of the most important, and to find a person well qualified for the position is no easy task. It being one of trust, it of course requires an honest and responsible incumbent; and it being, also, one of some personal risk, the man who fills the office should be possessed of both firmness and courage. In addition to these, the other duties of the Sheriff constantly bring him in contact with the business community, and here he requires the polish of the gentleman. These qualities, we take pleasure in saying, are possessed in a high degree by the Democratic nominee, P. J. White. In this city, where he has resided since 1891, he is well and enviably known as an honorable and successful merchant, of urbane manners, liberal and progressive views, strict integrity, generous disposition, and unquestioned moral and physical courage. Mr. White, also, has the advantage of being thoroughly conversant with the multifarious duties of the position. He was Sheriff of Sierra county during the years 1859 and '60; and how satisfactorily he discharged his duty the people of that county bear unqualified testimony. A more fit man could not have been nominated, and that he will receive the endorsement of all thinking men, who have enough independence to cast off the shackles of party, will be shown at the ballot box next Wednesday.—San Francisco Monitor.

Mr. Jacob Schreiber.—This well known merchant and pioneer resident among us is a candidate for Supervisor of the Eighth District on the National Republican ticket. Mr. Schreiber is just the man to represent the large and growing interests of the Eighth Ward. He has been many years in business, is extensively and popularly known, and in qualifications and probity is well fitted for the position for which he has been nominated. Should the residents of the 'Eighth' have the good luck to elect him, they may rely upon being more fortunate in the choice of a representative than they were at their last election for Supervisor.

California Powder Works.—These works are located at Santa Cruz, and have supplied the whole Pacific Coast with a superior article of blasting, sporting and cannon powder since their erection, and such has been the demand on their resources from time to time, that additional machinery and buildings were found necessary to supply the increasing demand. The importation from the East have fallen off in consequence, and the Eastern prices have been put down to $3 per keg for blasting. The California Works immediately responded to the reduction. We have not only a superior article of powder, but at the same price, and with this advantage—the dryness of our climate. Mr. John F. Shose is Secretary, office No. 318 California street.

Watches and Jewelry.—Henry Mayers, No. 205, Montgomery street, Russ House, has just received from Europe via Panama, a large invoice of fashionable jewelry, which he offers to the public at reasonable prices. The ladies should by all means call and examine these select goods if they want to be in the fashions, for jewelry now-a-days, like everything else, has its new fashions. Mr. Mayers also keeps on hand and for sale, American, English and Geneva watches, which he warrants to keep good time for twelve months. This is a rare chance to purchase a good time piece (which is guaranteed) at a moderate price. Don't forget the number, 205, Russ House, Montgomery street.

Boiler Making.—Inspectors of boilers do not always examine minutely the construction of the hundreds of bolts and rivets that are necessary to insure a boiler from bursting. It lies with the constructors to superintend this branch of the business, and also prevent the use of iron containing flaws in their construction. Boiler makers, above all other mechanics, should be men that practically understand their business. Messrs. Baurhyte & McAfee have established a Steam Boiler and Sheet Iron Works, on Howard street, between Fremont and Beale. Mr. McAfee has been engaged in this city in boiler making since 1850; and Mr. Baurhyte has been employed as engineer by the California Steam Navigation Company since 1852. We can recommend these gentlemen to the public as thoroughly practical men in their line of business.

Dry Goods—of the best quality, from the recent great auction sale of H. M. Newhall & Co., are now being sold by Meagher, Tauffe & Co., at prices lower than they have been offered for since the war. See advertisement.

Blood Purifier.—No other means for purifying the blood are equal to the baths of Dr. Bourne, 10 Masonic Temple, which, with good food and pure air, constitute all the elements of pure blood. All medicines professedly for that object are swindles. *

"No Baths Like Dr. Bourne's," is the universal testimony of all intelligent returned Californians, who having unsuccessfully sought their counterpart in all the great capitals of Europe and Asia, are entitled to pronounce a definite verdict. No. 10 Masonic Temple. *

UNFULFILLED.

OUR little table is spread for two,
With quaint old china, gold and blue.

Weird things are wrought on the homely walls,
As the conjuring firelight climbs and falls.

In the corner my ready sea chest stands,
Filled to the brim by the busiest hands.

Wife mirrors her face in the silver tongs;
I think of the morrow's rude sea-songs.

"I have pictures, love," she says, that gleam
From a troubled easel—last night's dream.

"A ship ashore on a coral reef,
And a woman ringing her hands in grief;

"She kneels in prayer; a whirling wheel
Grows out of the dead ship's plank and keel.

"She stands in the spinner's toiling place,
Till the rose in her cheek hath lost its grace.

"Her lessening form is changed to wool,
Yet the hungering spindle ne'er is full.

"A weed-grown raft keeps company
With a vacant boat on a sailless sea."

How apt is women's thoughts to build
Where a varying dream may darken or gild?

* * * * *

Life flies; my last sea-voyage is done;
Or wind, or calm, to me 'tis one.

Tea things are set for a golden few;
Again our china, quaint and blue.

The conjuring home-light climbs and crawls
O'er dainty laces and India shawls.

Wife mirrors her face in the silver tongs;
I think of yesterday's glad sea-songs.

"Tell, love, I pray, of the ship on the reef,
And the woman wringing her hands in grief;

"Of the spinner whose white arms changed to wool,
And the hungering spindle that ne'er grew full."

There are tears imprisoned within her eyes,
Which are loosened soon, as her voice replies:

"Woman will dream, and man will build,
And each will have prophecies unfulfilled."

A RAID UP THE EDISTO.

IT must be remembered, that, after the first capture of Port Royal, the outlying plantations along the whole Southern coast were abandoned, and the slaves withdrawn into the interior. It was necessary to ascend some river for thirty miles in order to reach the black population at all. This ascent could only be made by night, as it was a slow process, and the smoke of a steamboat could be seen for a great distance. The streams were unusually shallow, winding, and muddy, and the difficulties of navigation were such as to require a full moon and a flood tide. It was really no easy matter to bring everything to bear; especially as every projected raid must be kept a secret so far as possible. However, we were now somewhat familiar with such undertakings, half military, half naval, and the thing to be done on the Edisto was precisely what we had proved to be practicable on the St. Mary's and the St. John's,—to drop anchor before the enemy's door some morning at daybreak, without having dreamed of our approach.

Since a raid made by Colonel Montgomery up the Combahee, two months before, the vigilance of the Rebels had increased. But we had information that upon the South Edisto or Pon-Pon River the rice plantations were still being actively worked by a large number of negroes, in reliance on obstructions placed at the mouth of that narrow stream, where it joins the main river, some twenty miles from the coast. This point was known to be further protected by a battery of unknown strength, at Wiltown Bluff, a commanding and defensible situation. The obstructions consisted of a row of strong wooden piles across the river; but we convinced ourselves that these must now be much decayed, and that Captain Trowbridge, an excellent engineer officer, could remove them by proper apparatus. One proposition was to man the John Adams, an armed ferry-boat, which had before done us much service—and which has now reverted to the pursuits of peace, it is said, on the East Boston line—to ascend in this to Wiltown Bluff, silence the battery, and clear a passage through the obstructions. Leaving the John Adams to protect this point, we could then ascend the smaller stream with two light draft boats, and perhaps burn the bridge, on the Charleston and Savannah railroad, which was ten miles higher, before the enemy could bring sufficient force to make our position at Wiltown Bluff untenable.

The expedition was organized essentially upon this plan. The smaller boats were the Enoch Dean—a river steamboat, which carried a ten-pound Parrott gun, and a small howitzer—and a little mosquito of a tug, the Governor Milton upon which, with the greatest difficulty, we found room for two twelve-pound Armstrong guns, with their gunners, forming a section of the First Connecticut Battery, under Lieutenant Clinton, aided by a squad from my own regiment, under Captain James. The John Adams carried, if I remember rightly, two Parrott guns (of twenty and ten pounds calliber) and a howitzer or two. The whole force of men did not exceed two hundred and fifty.

We left Beaufort, S. C., on the afternoon of July 9th, 1863. I will stop to describe the charm of a moonlight ascent into a hostile country, upon an unknown stream, the dark and silent banks, the rippling water, the wail of the reed-birds, the anxious watch, the breathless listening, the veiled lights, the whispered orders. We steamed over the bar in safety, had a peaceful ascent, passed the island of Jehossee—the fine estate of Governor Aiken, then left undisturbed by both sides—and fired our first shell into the camp at Wiltown Bluff at four o'clock in the morning.

The battery—whether fixed or movable we knew not—met us with a promptness that proved very short-lived. After three shots it was silent, but we could not tell why. The bluff was wooded and we could see but little. The only course was to land, under cover of the guns. As the firing ceased and the smoke cleared away, I looked across the rice-fields which lay beneath the bluff. The first sunbeams glowed upon their emerald levels, and on the blossoming hedges along the rectangular dikes. What were those black dots which everywhere appeared? Those moist meadows had become alive with human heads, and along each narrow path came a straggling file of men and women, all on a run for the river-side. I went ashore with a boat-load of troops at once. The landing was difficult and marshy. The astonished negroes tugged us up the bank, and gazed on us as if we had been Cortez and Columbus. They kept arriving by land much faster than we could come by water; every moment increased the crowd, the jostling, the mutual clinging, on that miry foothold. What a scene it was! With the wild faces, eager figures, strange garments, it seemed, as one of the poor things reverently suggested, "like nothin' but de judgment day." Presently they began to come from the houses also, with their little bundles on their heads; then with larger bundles. Old women, trotting on the narrow paths, would kneel to pray a little prayer, still balancing the bundle; and then would suddenly spring up, urged by the accumulating procession behind, and would move on till irresistibly compelled by thankfulness to dip down for another invocation. Reaching us, every human being must grasp our hands, amid exclamations of "Bress yon, mas'r," and "Bress de Lord," at the rate of four of the latter ascriptions to one of the former. Women brought children on their shoulders; small black boys carried on their backs little brothers equally inky, and gravely depositing them, shook hands. Never had I seen human beings so clad, or rather so unclad, in such amazing squalidness and destitution of garments. I recall one small urchin without a rag of clothing save the basque waist of a lady's dress, bristling with whalebones, and worn wrong side before, beneath which his smooth ebony legs emerged like those of an ostrich from its plumage. How weak is imagination, how cold is memory, that I ever cease, for a day of my life, to see before me the picture of that astounding scene!

Yet at the time we were perforce a little impatient of all this piety, protestation, and hand-pressing; for the vital thing was to ascertain what force had been stationed at the bluff, and whether it was yet withdrawn. The slaves, on the other hand, were too much absorbed in their prospective freedom to aid us in taking any further steps to secure it. Captain Trowbridge, who had by this time landed at a different point, got quite into despair over the seeming deafness of the people to all questions.

I wish that it were possible to present all this scene from the point of view of the slaves themselves. It can be most nearly done, perhaps, by quoting the description given of a similar scene on the Combahee River, by a very aged man, who had been brought down on the previous raid, already mentioned. I wrote it down in my tent, long after, while the old man recited the tale, with much gesticulation, at the door; and it is by far the best glimpse I have ever had, through a negro's eyes, at these wonderful birthdays of freedom.

"De people was all a hoein', mas'r," said the old man. "Dey was a hoein' in de rice-field, when de gunboats come. Den ebry man drap dem hoe, and leff de rice. De mas'r he stand and call, 'Run to de woods for hide! Yankee come, sell you to Cuba! run for hide!' Ebry man he run, and, my God! run all toder way!

"Mas'r stand in de wood, peep, peep, faid for truss [afraid to trust]. He say, 'Run to de wood!' and ebry man run by him, straight to de boat.

"De brack sojer so presumptious, dey come right ashore, hold up dere head. Fus' ting I know, dere was a barn, ten tousand bushel rough rice, all in a blaze. Didn't keer for see 'em blaze? Lor, mas'r didn't care notin' at all, I was gwine to de boat."

Doré's Don Quixoto could not surpass the sublime absorption in which the gaunt old man, with arm uplifted, described this stage of affairs, till he ended in a shrewd chuckle, worthy of Sancho Panzo. Then he resumed.

"De brack sojers so presumptious!"

This he repeated three times, slowly shaking his head in an ecstacy of admiration. It flashed upon me that the appreciation of a black soldier must amaze those still in bondage, much as a butter-fly just from the chrysalis might astound his fellow grubs. I inwardly vowed that my soldiers, at least, should be as "presumptious" as I could make them. Then he went on.

"Ole woman and I go down to de boat; den dey say behind us, 'Rebels comin'!' Ole woman say, 'Come ahead, come plenty ahead!' I hab notin' on but my shirt and pantaloon; ole woman one single frock he hab on, and one handkerchief on he head; I leff all-two my blanket and run, for de Rebel come, and den dey didn't come, didn't truss for come.

"Ise eighty-eight years old, mas'r. My ole Mas'r Lowndes keep all de ages in a big book, and when we come to ago ob sense we mark em down ebry year, so I know. Too ole for come? Mas'r joking. Neber too ole for leave de land o' bondage. I old, but great good for chil'en, gib tousand tank ebry day. Young people can go through, force [forcibly], mas'r, but de ole folk mus' go slow."

Such emotions as these, no doubt, were inspired by our arrival, but we could only hear their hasty utterance in passing; our duty being, with the small force already landed, to take possession of the bluff. Ascending, with proper precautions, the wooden hill, we soon found ourselves in the deserted camp of a light battery, amid scattered equipments and suggestions of a very unattractive breakfast. As soon as possible, skirmishers were thrown out through the woods to the farther edge of the bluff, while a party searched the houses, finding the usual large supply of furniture and pictures—brought up for safety from below—but no soldiers. Captain Trowbridge then got the John Adams beside the row of piles, and went to work for their removal.

Again I had the exciting sensation of being within the hostile lines—the eager explorations, the doubts, the watchfulness, the listening for every sound of coming hoofs. Presently the tread of horses was heard in earnest, but it was a squad of our own men bringing in two captured cavalry soldiers. One of these, a study fellow, submitted quietly to his lot, only begging that, whenever we should evacuate the bluff, a note should be left behind, stating that he was a prisoner. The other, a very young man, and a member of the "Rebel Troop," a sort of Cadet corps among the Charleston youths, came to me in great wrath, complaining that the corporal of our squad had kicked him after he had surrendered. His air of offended pride was very rueful, and it did indeed seem a pathetic reversal of Fortunes for the two races. To be sure, the youth was a scion of one of the foremost families of South Carolina, and when I considered the wrongs which the black race had encountered from those of his blood, first and last, it seemed as if the most scrupulous Recording Angel might tolerate the final kick, to square the account. But I reproved the corporal, who respectfully disclaimed the charge, and said the kick was an incident of the scuffle. It certainly is not their habit to show such poor malice: they thought so well of themselves.

I recall with delight my conversation with this captured boy, he was such a naive specimen of the true Southern arrogance. For instance:

"Colonel," said he, respectfully, "are there any gentlemen on board the steamboat where I am to be placed?"

I told him that such a question sounded strangely from a captured private soldier.

"Perhaps it does," said he wistfully, "and I know my position too well to offend an enemy. I only wished to know"—and here he paused, evidently trying to find some form of expression which could not possibly disturb the keenest sensibilities—"if there is likely to be any one on board with whom I can associate."

This was carrying the joke rather too far. I told him that he would find United States officers on board, and United States soldiers, and that it was to be hoped he would like their society, as he probably would have no other for some time to come. But the characteristic feature of the thing is, that I do not believe he meant to commit any impertinence whatever, but that the youth rather aimed to compliment me by assuming that I appreciated the feelings of man made of porcelain, and would allot him to only the most choice and fastidious companionship.

His demeanor seemed less lofty, but rather piteous, when he implored me not to put him on board any vessel which was to ascend the upper stream, and hinted, by awful implications, the danger of such ascent. This meant torpedoes, a peril which we treated, in those days, with rather mistaken contempt. But we found none on the Edisto, and it may be that it was only a foolish attempt to alarm us.

Meanwhile, Trowbridge was toiling away at the row of piles, which proved easier to draw out than to saw asunder, either work being hard enough. It took far longer than we had hoped, and we saw noon approach and the tide rapidly fall, taking with it, inch by inch, our hopes of effecting a surprise at the bridge. During this time, and indeed all day, the detachments on shore, under Captains Whitney and Sampson, were having occasional skirmishes with the enemy, while the colored people were swarming to the shore, or running to and fro like ants, with the poor treasures of their houses.

Our busy Quartermaster, Mr. Bingham—who died afterwards from the overwork of that sultry day—was transporting the refugees on board the steamer, or hunting up bales of cotton, or directing the burning of rice-houses, in accordance with our orders. No dwelling-houses were destroyed or plundered by our men—Sherman's "bummers" not having yet arrived—though I asked no questions as to what the plantation negroes might bring in their great bundles. One piece of property, I must admit, seemed a lawful capture—a United States dress-sword, of the old pattern, which had belonged to the Rebel general who afterwards gave the order to bury Colonel Shaw "with his niggers." That I have retained, not without some satisfaction, to this day.

A passage having been cleared at last, and the tide having turned by noon, we lost no time in attempting the ascent, leaving the bluff to be held by the John Adams and by the small force on shore. We were scarcely above the obstructions, however, when the little tug went aground, and the Enoch Dean, ascending a mile farther, had an encounter with a battery on the right—perhaps our old enemy—and drove it back. Soon after, she also ran aground, a misfortune of which our opponent strangely took no advantage; and, on getting off, I thought it best to drop down to the bluff again, as the tide was still hopelessly low. None can tell, save those who have tried them, the vexations of those muddy Southern streams, navigable only during a few hours of flood-tide.

After waiting an hour, the two small vessels again tried the ascent. The enemy on the right had disappeared; but we could now see, far off on our left, another light battery moving parallel with the river, apparently to meet us at some upper bend. But for the present we were safe, with the low rice-fields on each side of us; and the scene was so peaceful, it seemed as if all danger were done. For the first time, we saw in South Carolina blossoming river-banks and low emerald meadows, that seemed like New England. Everywhere there were the same rectangular fields, smooth canals, and bushy dikes. A few negroes stole out to us in dug-outs, and breathlessly told us how others had been hurried away by the overseers. We glided safely on, mile after mile. The day was unutterably hot, but all else seemed propitious. The men had their combustibles all ready to fire the bridge, and our hopes were unbounded.

But by degrees the channel grew more tortuous and difficult, and while the little Milton glided smoothly over everything, the Enoch Dean, my own boat, repeatedly grounded. On every occasion of especial need, too, something went wrong in her machinery—her engine being constructed on some wholly new patent, of which, I should hope, this trial would prove entirely sufficient. The black pilot, who was not a soldier, grew more and more bewildered, and declared that it was the channel, not his brain, which had gone wrong; the captain, a little elderly man, sat wringing his hands in the pilot-box; and the engineer appeared to be mingling his groans with those of the diseased engine. Meanwhile I, in equal ignorance of machinery and channel, had to give orders only justified by minute acquaintance with both. So I navigated on general principles, until they grounded us on a mud-bank, just below a wooded point, and some two miles from the bridge and of our destination. It was with a pang that I waved to Major Strong, who was on the other side of the channel in a tug, not to risk approaching us, but to steam on and finish the work, if he could.

Short was his triumph. Gliding round the point, he found himself instantly engaged with a light battery of four or six guns, doubtless the same we had seen in the distance. The Milton was within two hundred and fifty yards. The Connecticut men fought their guns well, aided by the blacks, and it was exasperating for us to hear the shots, while we could see nothing and do nothing. The scanty ammunition of our bow gun was exhausted, and the gun in the stern was useless, from the position in which we lay. In vain we moved the men from side to side, rocking the vessel, to dislodge it. The heat was terrific that August afternoon; I remember I found myself constantly changing places, on the scorched deck, to keep my feet from being blistered. At last the officer in charge of the gun, a hardy lumberman from Maine, got the stern of the vessel so far round that he obtained the range of the battery through the cabin windows, "but it would be necessary," he coolly added, on reporting to me this fact, "to shoot away the corner of the cabin." I knew that this apartment was newly painted and gilded, and the idol of the poor captain's heart; but it was plain that even the destruction of his own upholstery could not make the poor soul more wretched than he was. So I bade Captain Dolly blaze away, and thus we took our hand in the little game, though at a sacrifice.

It was of no use. Down drifted our little consort round the point, her engine disabled and her engineer killed, as we afterwards found, though then we could only look and wonder. Still pluckily firing, she floated by upon the tide, which had now just turned; and when, with a last desperate effort, we got off, our engine had one of her impracticable fits, and we, too, could only float down with the tide. The day was waning, and all its range of possibility had lain within the limits of that one tide.

All our previous expeditions had been so successful, it now seemed hard to turn back; the river-banks and rice-fields, so beautiful before, seemed only a vexation now. But the swift current bore us on, and after our Parthian shots had died away, a new discharge of artillery opened upon us, from our first antagonist of the morning, which still kept the other side of the stream. They had taken up a strong position on another bluff, almost out of range of the John Adams, but within easy range of us. Happily, the engine and engineer were now behaving well, and we were steering in a channel already traversed, and of which the dangerous points were known. But we had a long, straight reach for the river before us, heading directly toward the battery, which, having once got our range, had only to keep it, while we could do nothing in return. The Rebels certainly served their guns well. For the first time I discovered there was certain compensating advantages in a slightly built craft, as compared with one more substantial: the missiles never lodged in the vessel but crashed through some thin partition as if it were paper, to explode beyond us, or fall harmless in the water. Splintering, the chief source of wounds and death in wooden ships, was thus entirely avoided; the danger was, that our machinery might be disabled, or that shots might strike below the water-line, and sink us.

This, however, did not happen. Fifteen projectiles, as we afterwards computed, passed through the vessel or cut the rigging. Yet few casualties occurred, and those instantly fatal. As my orderly stood leaning on a comrade's shoulder, the head of the latter was shot off. At last I myself felt a sudden blow in the side, as if from prize-fighter, doubling me up for a moment, while I sank upon a seat. It proved afterwards to have been produced by the grazing of a ball, which, without tearing a garment, had yet made a large part of my side black and blue, leaving a sensation of paralysis which made it difficult to stand. Supporting myself on Captain Rogers, I tried to comprehend what had happened, and I remembered being impressed by an odd feeling that I had now got my share, and should henceforth be a great deal safer than any of the rest. I am told that this often follows one's first experience of a wound.

But this immediate contest, sharp as it was, proved brief; a turn in the river enabled us to use our stern gun, and we soon glided into the comparative shelter of Wiltown Bluff. There, however, we were to encounter the danger of shipwreck, superadded to that of fight. When the passage through the piles was first cleared, it had been marked by stakes, lest the rising tide should cover the remaining piles and make it difficult to find the passage. But when we again reached it, the stakes had somehow been knocked away, the piles were just covered by the swift current, and the little tug-boat was aground upon them. She came off easily, however, with our aid, and, when we in turn essayed the passage, we grounded also, but more firmly. We getting off at last, and making the passage, the tug again became lodged, when nearly past the danger, and all our efforts proved powerless to pull her through. I therefore dropped down below, and sent the John Adams to her aid, while I superintended the recall of the pickets, and the embarkation of the remaining refugees.

While thus engaged, I felt little solicitude about the boats above. It was certain that the John Adams could safely go close to the piles on the lower side, that she was very strong, and that the other was very light. Still, it was natural to cast some anxious glances up the river; and it was with surprise that I presently saw a canoe descending, which contained Major Strong. Coming on board, he told me with some excitement that the tug could not possibly be got off, and he wished for orders.

It was no time to consider whether it was not his place to have given orders, instead of going half a mile to seek them. I was by this time so far exhausted that everything seemed to pass by me as by one in a dream; but I got into a boat, pushed up stream, met presently the John Adams returning, and was informed by the officer in charge of the Connecticut battery that he had abandoned the tug, and—worse news yet—that his guns had been thrown overboard. It seemed to me then, and has always seemed, that this sacrifice was utterly needless, because, although the captain of the John Adams had refused to risk his vessel by going near enough to receive the guns, he should have been compelled to do so. Though the thing was done without my knowledge, and beyond my reach, yet, as commander of the expedition, I was technically responsible. It was hard to blame a lieutenant when his senior had shrunk from a decision, and left him alone; nor was it easy to blame Major Strong, whom I knew to be a man of personal courage, though without much decision of character. He was subsequently tried by court-martial and acquitted, after which he resigned, and was lost at sea on his way home.

The tug, being thus abandoned, must of course be burned to prevent her from falling into the enemy's hands. Major Strong went with prompt fearlessness to do this at my order; after which he remained on the Enoch Dean and I went on board of the John Adams, being compelled to succumb at last, and transferred all remaining responsibility to Capt. Trowbridge. Exhausted as I was, I could still observe, in a vague way, the scene around me. Every available corner of the boat seemed like some vast auction-room of second-hand goods. Great piles of bedding and bundles lay on every side, with black heads emerging and black forms reclining in every stage of squalidness. Some seemed ill, or wounded, or asleep; others were chattering eagerly among themselves, singing, praying, or soliloquizing on joys to come. "Bress de Lord," I heard one woman say, "I spec' I get salt victual now—nothin' but fresh victual dese six months, but Ise get salt victual now,"—thus reversing, under pressure of the salt-embargo, the usual anticipations of voyagers.

Thus we glided down the river in the waning light. Once more we encountered a battery, making five in all; I could hear the guns of the assailants, but could not distinguish the explosion of their shells from the answering throb of our own guns. The kind Quartermaster kept bringing me news of what occurred, like Rebecca in Front-de-Bœuf's castle, but discreetly withholding any actual casualties. Then all faded into safety and sleep; and we reached Beaufort in the morning, after thirty-six hours of absence. A kind friend, who acted in South Carolina a nobler part amid tragedies than in any of her early stage triumphs, met us with an ambulance at the wharf, and the prisoners, the wounded, and the dead were duly attended.

The reader will not care for any personal record of convalescence; though, among the general military laudations of whisky, it is worth while to say that one life was saved, in the opinion of my surgeons, by an habitual abstinence from it, leaving no food for peritoneal inflammation to feed upon. The able-bodied men who had joined us were sent to aid General Gillmore in the trenches, while their families were established in huts and tents on St. Helena Island. A year after, greatly to the delight of the regiment, in taking possession of a battery which they had helped to capture on James Island, they found in their hands the selfsame guns which they had seen thrown overboard from the Governor Milton. They then felt that their account with the enemy was squared, and could proceed to further operations.

Before the war, how great a thing seemed the rescue of even one man from slavery; and since the war has emancipated all, how little seems the liberation of two hundred! But no one then knew how the contest might end; and when I think of that morning sunlight, those emerald fields, those thronging numbers, the old women with their prayers, and the little boys with their living burdens, it seems to me that the day was worth all it cost, and more.—Atlantic Monthly.

The Decendants of Captain Cook's Pigs—The native (Maori) saying is "As the white man's rat has driven away the native rat, as the European fly drives away our own, and the clover kills our fern, so will the Maoris disappear before the white man himself." It is wonderful to behold the botanical and zoological changes which have taken place since Captain Cook set foot in New Zealand. Some pigs which he left with the natives have increased and run wild in such a way that it is impossible to destroy them. There are large tracts of country where they reign supreme. The soil looks as if it were ploughed by their burrowing. Some station holders of 100,000 acres have had to make contracts for killat 6d. per tail, and as many as 22,000 on a single run have been killed by adventurous parties without any diminution being discernible. Not only are they obnoxious by occupying the ground which the sheep farmer needs for his flocks, but they assiduously follows the ewes when lambing, and devouring the poor lambs as soon as they make their appearance. They do not exist on the western side of the mountain, and only on the lower grounds on the eastern side, where the snow seldom falls, so that the explorer has not the advantage of profiting by there existance where food is the scarcest.—Dr. Haast.

Imagination in Elephants.—A writer in the London Spectator asserts that the elephant is a highly imaginative animal, and quotes the Ceylon engineers, who say that when they survey ways through the forests and plant wooden tracing pegs to mark the levels taken during the day, their tracing pegs are generally removed during the night by elephants, who are uneasy till they understand these novel symptoms of human agency. It is clear, then, that the elephants are rendered uneasy, troubled in their imaginations, by these curious marks of special and unexplained human interest in their dwelling place. Indeed it is a recognized and generally very successful way to escape a vicious elephant to throw down anything complicated in his path, which, in his caution, he will examine so carefully before he proceeds as to give his chase time to escape. Colonel Hardy, in 1820, saved himself from a vicious "rogue" elephant by throwing down his dressing case, which the creature in question wanted to force open and examine minutely, instrument by instrument. Another peculiarity of the animal is that the herds will never mingle. When suspicious of danger they throw out pickets, which are stationed after careful reconnoitering by the leader of the herd. Whenever a herd of elephants is at bay, it always follows one leader, and if that leader is slain, follows the next, and so on till the last is left in isolation.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO,.....SATURDAY, AUGUST 31, 1867.

A CALIFORNIAN POET.*

PROBABLY the majority of men possessing a fair share of culture and sentiment indulge, to some extent, in the composition of verses at certain critical periods of life, when the sensibilities or the affections are first deeply stirred under circumstances that admit of being viewed through an atmosphere of romance. Few men succeed in getting through college without having been guilty of rhyme, which, after all, may perhaps be regarded as a misfortune rather then a crime, unless the accomplishment is magnified by its possessor into an evidence of his superiority over ordinary mortals, and leads to an unfounded conceit of genius and a neglect of the practical duties of life. Yet of this melancholy result there is always more or less danger; for when a young and inexperienced person finds himself able to produce compositions in verse, smooth in their flow, graceful in sentiment, and pleasant to the ear, what more natural than that he should believe himself to be a poet and aspire to the laurel? Unless possessing an unusual ballast of good sense he will inevitably do so, and then the consequences cannot fail to prove most deplorable. For having once entered upon such a career, pride, ambition, obstinacy, all combine to keep him in it. Criticism affronts his conceit and arouses his combattiveness. He will not be put down; he will persevere; he will compel a recognition of his genius; he will humble his enemies and justify the favorable judgement of his friends and admirers. We are not now speaking of the weaklings who indite such drivel as is found in the poets' corners of country newspapers, stuff that tends to make the name of "poet" a term of derision, and impels one to turn in sadness and pity from a fellow-man convicted of dabbling in verse. Here, there is no waste, or misapplication of intellectual force to deplore, for the force does not exist. These driveling brethren are harmless, nay sometimes serviceable as promoters of mirth in those whose hearts are hard enough to enable them to remain unaffected by the pathetic side of the phenomenon. We are not speaking of such as these, but of men who possess taste, culture, sensibility, talent, and even genuine poetic feeling, which they mistake for a far different and rarer gift—poetic genius, without which, it is a deplorable waste of force and time for any man to continue to write verses otherwise than as the diversion of his leisure hours. Though good poetry is often the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings, yet it must be the overflow of a mind not constituted like other minds, but of one characterized by a peculiar organic sensibility. Such a mind may in moments of excitement produce poems, but it cannot long continue to produce them, and to produce them in such number and variety as entitles the producer to the sacred name of "poet" in its exalted sense, unless in addition to this exceptional organization, the writer is given to habits of deep thought and meditative contemplation. Colcridge says, somewhere, that no man was never yet a great poet without being at the same time a philosopher, since poetry is the blossom and fragrance of all human knowledge, thought, passion, and emotion. And we cannot doubt that this is so; for not only in all "great poets," but in all true ones, we may find a genuine philosophy, not didatic, or formal; often unconscious, and such as the singer himself could not methodically unfold. We find it not only in Shakspeare and Goethe, Wordsworth and Coleridge, but in Tennyson, Browning, Longfellow, Whittier; and where indications of it, in the shape of some individual and idiosyncratic habit of contemptlating life, duty, nature, the human soul, the relations of men, or other subjects of thought, are not to be found there, however much of the external form and beauty of poetry may exist, the spiritual essence is wanting. And, unless the poet differs from other men, is a "seer" in a sense in which they are not, an interpreter of mysteries within us or without, and can show them to us in other aspects than those in which we view them by the dry light of the intellect, unless he is by so much as this, more than a deft weaver of melodies that charm the ear, he is but an elegant idler, a slight minister to our pleasures, and all the familiar glorifications of him and his office with which our literature abounds, are abominable cant.

Tried by this exalted standard, and with the most rigorous impartiality, upon the evidence furnished in this volume, Mr. Stoddard will, without hesitation, be pronounced a true poet, by any competent critical tribunal. We presume he would himself be the first to smile at hearing himself dubbed a philosopher; but it is, nevertheless, clear to the thoughtful reader of his little book, that he has already begun to look around and within him, on nature, and into his own soul, to ascertain for himself what can be seen and discovered, and to make report thereof, after a fashion of his own, without too much regard to what others may have seen there. Before such a tribunal as we have hinted at, we should be quite content to "rest the case" on Mr. Stoddard's behalf, on eight of the pieces in the book, with no anxiety as to the verdict even had he never produced another line. These pieces are "The Awakening," "The Two Cleopatras," "In the Desert," "My Friend," "Singing Shells," the "Night Song," "Fame," and "In Memoriam." That the man who wrote these pieces is a born poet, no one could doubt, and being informed that he is a very young man, few would think it altogether unreasonable to anticipate that he might become a great poet. We have selected these eight poems, not because they are absolutely the best in the volume, though five of them would have to be named as among the best, but because, taken together, they fully illustrate all the higher characteristics of Mr. Stoddard's genius. Even where they are faulty, or fail to achieve a complete artistic developement of the writer's conception, they evince rare poetic gifts. Some of Mr. Stoddard's admirers have a habit of citing "At Anchor," and "Drifting" as the best illustrations of his powers. But neither of them contains a line, or phrase, or image that is at all characteristic of the writer. They are mere echos of Tennyson.

"All can raise the flowers now, for all have got the seed."

Says, or sings the laureate, alluding to his imitators—

"And some are pretty enough, and some are poor indeed."

Of the two "flowers" in question, we think it quite probable that Mr. Tennyson would say they were "pretty enough;" but no one can doubt for a moment out of whose garden the "seed" came. Among the pieces that we have named, there are also several in which we can detect "echos" of the music of other minstrels: but they are less literal, and are varied by strains of Mr. Stoddard's own. The "Two Cleopatras," perhaps the most ambitious piece in the volume, is strongly suggestive of Alexander Smith. It is elaborate, and rich in fancies too strained for true poetical effect, but is not a successful effort; yet it could only have been written by one who sees with a poet's eye, and is dowered with a poet's imagination; we cite it not for what it is but for what it indicates. "The Awakening," commencing in the manner of Tennyson, after the fourth stanza begins to remind us of Longfellow. But it contains strong and noble verses uttered in the writer's own idiom, and moving to his own music. We cite it, not for any great power or originality that it evinces, but as an illustration of the singularly pure and elevated sentiment that pervades all Mr. Stoddard's meditative poems. "My Friend," is not better than several others in the book, of the class to which it belongs, all of which in austere simplicity of manner, in a quaintness that is not affectation, and in their sweet sobriety of spirit, remind us of George Herbert. In this class, besides "My Friend," are the "Secret Well," "At the Spring," "A Rhyme of Life," which Herbert himself might have written, and "Compensation." Now a discriminating reader, who had seen none of Mr. Stoddard's poems except those already specially commented upon, would inevitably have conceived a high idea of the writer's genius within certain limitations. But let him turn to "Singing Shells," "The Night Song," "In Memoriam," and "The Comet," and he will discover another string of the poet's harp capable of discoursing most eloquent music; a music not learned in the school of either Tennyson or Alexander Smith, or of the old Elizabethan writers, though it might possibly set one dreaming of Shelly. "Fame," terse, direct, and strong, is in quite a different key again, and is the only poem in the volume to indicate the possession by the writer of what is popularly called "lyric force." We flatter ourselves that there are very few pieces of Mr. Stoddard's that we could not readily recognize as his, if seen for the first time. This, however, is one of the few. As it is the only poem of the kind that the author has ever published, and is in a manner so unlike that which is characteristic of him, we will quote it:

FAME.

She charmed him with her charming eye;
To know its luster was to die,
Or feed forever on its light.
She bore him to her mountain height;
With wine-sweet lips she kissed to rest
The thousand longings in his breast.

She ringed him with her glittering coils;
Her flattering words were soft as oils,
All swam before his drunken sight;
He felt his beauty and his might,
And cursed the darkness as he hurled
Defiance at the crouching world.

He did not know her treachery:
But thought her tightened grasp to be
The clasp of love—O! heavy fate!
She thrust him in the face of hate
With all the venom in her born,
And slew him with her tongue of scorn.

"In The Desert," is another distinctive poem, revealing capabilities in the poet that fully appear in no other piece in the volume, though suggested by occasional phrases. It is so graphic and distinctly outlined, that a painter could put it all on canvass as easily as if he had seen it with the bodily eye, and we have not a doubt that the poet, reversing this process, took his hint from some picture which he has most effectively translated into verse. The confidence with which we have expressed our conviction of the high poetical status to which Mr. Stoddard is entitled, is not based upon the relative value of the poems we have mentioned, as compared with the productions of other writers, but upon their intrinsic quality, and their excellence in kind. Any half dozen of them would prove the author a poet. The eagle is not the less easily recognized as an eagle, because he has not yet learned to soar on powerful and unfaltering pinions, or to take his loftiest flight. Though our poet's song often sounds like the echo of some master at whose feet he has sat in affectionate homage; though he does not always succeed in giving complete and symmetrical development to his idea; and though his harp at times gives forth an uncertain sound, as though he had not accurately measured, or adequately mastered its capabilities, it is impossible to mistake the quality of its music, or the compass and power of the instrument itself. This volume settles Mr. Stoddard's standing as a poet, beyond cavil; and henceforth patronizing newspaper notices of his productions by "friendly critics" may be dispensed with as impertinences rather than favors. He is henceforth to be regarded as entitled to an honorable rank among American poets, not so much because he has laboriously struggled for a foothold on Parnassus, as because a place there belonged to him of natural right. His singing robes are as much the gift of nature as the plumage of the bird, or the sheeny armor of the gold fish. We have not said the half of what we wished to say concerning Mr. Stoddard's volume, or the half of what we designed to say when we commenced writing this article. But we have quite exhausted the space which can at present be devoted to it, and must, therefore, reserve further comment for another occasion.

STOP THIEF!

"A FRIEND who is quite evidently the owner of a dog, sends us an interesting paper wherein he dwells upon the virtues and faults of the canine race in general, and one dog particularly."—New York Dispatch, July 28th.

Underneath this preface follows the sketch written for THE CALIFORNIAN some months since by Prentice Mulford entitled "Our Dog." We admire the impudence of the Dispatch more than its honesty. We've lost Nip. The pound guerrillas captured him last week, and not having the necessary five dollars for redemption, we were obliged to suffer canine bereavment, and Nip is probably in or at least on the road to Heaven, a place never to be entered by the editors of the New York Weekly Dispatch unless they mend their ways, and learn to render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, unto the CALIFORNIAN the things which are the CALIFORNIAN'S, and unto Prentice Mulford the things which are Prentice Mulford's. The municipal dog banditti are infinitely below the animals they imprison and murder, yet they are angels of light compared to these waylaying literary footpads who would thus rob people of whatever little hard earned reputation they may possess.

Put that in your pipe and smoke it, Mr. Dispatch, and after this please give us credit for whatever ears you may glean from the CALIFORNIAN'S cornfield. "A friend sends us." A friend indeed! Such impudence! Don't call us friend. Our sympathies are wide enough and broad enough to give Judas Iscarriot the best room in our house, and the best the market affords for breakfast, without demanding of him even one of his dearly bought thirty pieces of silver; but we'd keep the pilfering editors of the Dispatch out in the cold a long time before they should warm themselves at our chimney corner.

GEORGE AGUSTUS SALA proposes to revisit this country disguised as a lecturer.

REHEARSAL.

A THEATRICAL rehearsal is the dry skeleton of the play stripped of its gilt, glitter and gaudy plumage. Enter the theatre in the day-time. It seems a huge, gloomy, gas-seented, wooden cavern. Down obscure steps you stnmble and along dark aisles grope with a sensation that at the next moment you are to fall into some uncovered hole, and then yon bring up suddenly against some dramatic young man or woman emerging from the place. On the stage is a portion of the company. They do not rehearse in costume, Mr. Pea Green—not at all. That is Hamlet yonder with an umbrella. Polonius is practicing a very common double shuffle before the Queen, and Laertes is playfully poking the King in the back with his cane. Men with paper caps, above and below, are hammering, sawing and painting. Seated at a table near the footlights is the stage manager. Three of the ladies and two of the gentlemen belonging to the company are clustered about the right-hand lower box, engaged in a lively and apparently amusing conversation. The people, male and female at the rear are the villagers, peasantry and soldiers. On the other side an industrious lady is sewing, and another is squatting, like unto a hop-toad, on the edge of the stage talking to the leader of the orchestra, who, with his noisy confederates, is playing straggling bars of music.

You may get as perfect an idea of a play by seeing it rehearsed as you do of Shakspeare from hearing it read in Hindostanee. The first act consists in an exhibition of great irritability and impatience by the stage manager at the non-appearance of certain members of the troupe.

At what theatre? O, never mind what theatre. We will take liberties and mix them thus:

Stage Manager.—(calling to some one at the front entrance)—"Send those people in!"

The people are finally hunted up, one by one, and go rushing down the passage and on the stage like human whirlwinds.

Leading Lady.—(reading)—"My chains a-a-a-a-a rivet me nm-um-um (carpenters burst out in a tremenduous fit of hammering) this man.

Star.—"But I implore — huz-huz-buz — never—um-um (great sawing of hoards somewhere).

Rehearsal reading, mind you, consists in the occasional distinct utterance of a word sandwiched in between large quantities of a strange, monotonous sound, something between a drawl and a buz, the last two or three words of the part being brought out with an emphatic jerk.

Here Th---n rushes from the rear.

"Now my revenge."

Star.—(giving directions.)

No, yon Mr. H-s-n stand here, and then when I approach you, Mr. B-r-y, step a little to the left, then the soldiers pitch into the villagers and the villagers into the soldiers, and I shoot you and escape up into the mountain."

Stage Manager, who thinks differently.—"Allow me to suggest, Mr. B——s, that—(here the hammering and sawing burst out all over the stage and drown everything).

This matter is finally settled. The decision of the oldest member of the troupe, the patriarch of the company having been appealed to, is adopted. Then Mr. Mc——h is missing. The manager bawls "Mc——h!" Everybody bawls Mc——h! Gimlet! Gimlet! This is the playful rehearsal appellation for Hamlet. Gimlet is at length captured, and goes rushing like a locomotive down the passage.

Stage Manager.—"Now, ladies and gentlemen. All on!"

They tumble up the stage steps and gather in groups. H-l-n fences with everybody. Miss H-w-n, (never mind which,) executes an imperfect pas seul.

Leading Lady.—I-a-a-a-a love-um-um-um—and-a-a-a another—

Miss H-l-y, Miss M-d-e or any other woman. "This engage-a-a-a my son's um-um-um Bank Exchange."

A-d-n raises his hands and eyes to Heaven saying, "Great Father he's drunk!"

Leading Lady.—(very energetically), "Go not dearest Hawes! The Gorhamites are a-a-a-a-um-um devour thee."

Mrs. S-n-s.—"How! What!!"

Mrs. J——h.—"Are those the peasantry up there?" (boy comes up to the stage and addresses the manager through his nose,) "Mr. G. I can't find him anywhere."

H—y J—n.—"Forasmuch as I——" (terrible hammering).

Nasal Boy.—"Mr. G., I can't find him anywhere."

L—c—h.—"Stop my paper!"

Manager.—Mr. L., that must be brought out very strong, thus, "Stop my paper!!"

L—c—h.—(bringing it out with an emphasis which raises the roof of the theatre.)—"Stop my paper!!!!"

The leading lady here goes through the motion of fainting, and falls against the Star, who is partly unbalanced by her weight and momentum. The Star then rushes distractedly about arranging the supernumeries to his liking. Ed—s and B—y walk abstractedly to and fro. S—n—r dances to a lady near the wings. These impromptu dances seem to be a favorite pastime on the undressed stage.

Second Lady.—"Positively a-a-a Tom Fitch-nm-um amusing a-aitch, a-aitch-a-aitch-a-aitch."

It puzzled me for a long time to find out what was meant by this repetition of a-aitch. It is simply the reading of laughter. A-aitch is where "the laugh comes in." The genuine peals of laughter are reserved for the regular performance. Actresses cannot afford to cachchinate during the tediousness and drudgery of rehearsal. Usually they feel like crying.

Stage Manager.—"We must rehearse this last act over again."

Everybody at this announcement looks broadswords and daggers. There are some very pretty pouts from the ladies, and some deep, but energetic profanity from the gentleman.

Much more than this is said and done at rehearsal, but it is all equally tedious and monotonous. Daily do these unfortunate people go through such a performance from ten A. M. to one or two P. M. And then they go home for a few hours, perhaps to study their parts and get up their wardrobes. I have no aspirations. Have you, Mr. Pea Green? If so, go—go on the stage, but let it be one that carries the mail and passengers.

DRAMATIC AFFAIRS.

ON Monday night, an immense audience assembled in Maguire's Opera House, to do honor to Henry Edwards on the occasion of his benefit. Edwin Adams had kindly volunteered to make one more appearance on this occasion, to testify his esteem for his brother actor, and Mr. and Mrs. Bates, with a similar object in view, consented to defer the commencement of their engagement until the following night. Henry IV was played with Mr. Edwards as "Falstaff." It was rather a dangerous part for any man to attempt. There seemed to be scarcely one person in the Opera House that night, who had not seen "Hackett" in the character. Mr. Edwards had made his appearance on the stage but a few minutes and had hardly spoken a line before people began to whisper, "I don't think any one can play "Falstaff" but Hackett. "Did you see Hackett?" Ah, Hackett was the "Falstaff" etc., etc. It was lucky for Mr. Edwards that he did not hear these remarks, or he would certainly have become nervous. His impersonation of the character was good throughout, and especially artistic and finished in the scene in Dame Quickly's inn, after the robbery on Gadshill. Mr. Adams, I suppose, played "Hotspur," for the first time, and probably undertook the part to oblige Mr. Edwards. Under these circumstances it would not be right to criticise very severely, the performance of an actor who has done so many things well, but I must say that Mr. Adams ranted considerably and failed in making many points. John McCullough was rather stiff as "Prince Henry" in the first act of the play; in the last act he was more at home. Altogether Henry IV was not well played, but Mr. Edwards acted well as he always does and the public on this occasion acted well to him.

Yesterday, Edwin Adams took his departure from San Francisco on the Montana, having relinquished his intention of playing an engagement in Sacramento. Mr. Adams during his stay in this city made a host of friends, many of whom accompanied him to the steamer. Yesterday afternoon, there was grief and lamentation at the Opera House; all regretted the loss of a gentleman and a good fellow from their ranks.

On Tuesday, Mr. and Mrs. Bates made their first appearance before a San Francisco audience, appearing in the respective parts of "Armand Duval" and "Camille," in the play of Camille. The fact that this play was chosen for the occasion of the debut of these artistes in this city, convinced most people that Mrs. Bates rather than Mr. Bates was the "star performer." "Armand Duval" not being a part which any actor would choose for a first appearance. Mrs. Bates met with a most kind reception, and speedily won the favor of the audience. Her "Camille" is the best—with, some people think, the exception of Miss Davenport's—that has ever been witnessed in this city. Mrs. Bates has a handsome face, a graceful carriage, and a sympathetic voice. Her rendition of the part was even and well sustained, being equally good in the first and the last acts. In the fourth act she was especially good; her grief, when charged with falsity by "Armand," was wonderfully real, and her sobs awoke many a responsive echo in the breasts of the ladies among the audience. Twice she was guilty of boisterous declamation when a quiet and intense style would have been more telling; but both her reading and acting were generally so good that as a whole, her impersonation of "Camille" will stand the test of severe criticism. Mrs. Bates possesses the naturalness of style which made Miss Alice Kingsbury so great a favorite, and is at the same time a far better actress. Mr. Bates made a very gloomy "Armand Duval," but made a good impression in the fourth act "where he denounces "Camille's" perfidy. Miss Sallie Hinckley, who has of late been promoted to far more important parts, took kindly to the character of "Nanine," and bestowed as much care on representing it faithfully as she would on that of "Pauline." D. C. Anderson's make-up for "George Duval," was very good; he represented an old French gentleman perfectly. On Wednesday, The Hunchback was presented with Mr. Bates as "Master Walter," and Mrs. Bates as "Julia." Mr. Bates over acted "Master Walter;" the character is much more effectively represented when played quietly. I fancy that Mr. Bates is at present sacrificing his reputation in order to secure his wife's success, and that when he appears in parts more suited to him he will create a more favorable impression.

On Thursday evening, Camille was repeated to a good house. On Friday, Leah, the Forsaken was played. Leah will be presented once more, and in the evening Lucretia Borgia will be produced. The talent of Mrs. Bates, and the rapid succession of new plays should ensure crowded houses. On Monday, East Lynn will be performed, in which Mrs. Bates will challenge comparison with those who have before played "Lady Isabel;" one I could mention is hard to surpass.

On Saturday last the San Francisco Harmonie Society (Mitgliedern der San Francisco Harmonie,) the oldest German singing club in this city, gave a capital entertainment at Platt's Hall. A large and fashionable audience was present. The performance consisted of the opera travestie of Die Barden, composed by Julius Freudenthal, musical director to the Duke of Brunswick. Die Barden is a travestie of the opera of Norma; the music is extremely fine; the libretto is shocking nonsense. It was produced with full costumes and appropriate scenery. In the first scene, Orobustes and the bards make their appearance, and a solo and splendid chorus are sung. The Harmonie Society numbers many fine singers among its members, and the chorus was exceedingly well sung. Mr. Conradi, who took the character of "Orobustes" has a glorious baritone voice and knows how to use it. Mr. Jansen sang and acted very well in the role of the "Oberbarde." The fair, but frail "Freia" was capitally impersonated by Mr. Braun, who made up for, and acted the part excellently well. "Piefke"—poet fruher Schneider—a poet, formerly a tailor, was of course well represented by Mr. Schraubstadter, who did full justice to the beautiful music wedded to abominable verse which fell to his share. Bellini's music is sometimes sadly caricatured, at others it is treated with the utmost reverence, and made to serve as the theme for a splendid chorus. All who were present at Platt's Hall on last Saturday night, enjoyed themselves thoroughly. It is to be hoped that the San Francisco Harmonie Society will, on some future occasion, afford the general public an opportunity of listening to their sweet singing. Die Barden would, I am sure, please all lovers of music.

On Monday the play entitled True to the Core, which gained the prize left by the late T. P. Cooke to be awarded to the best nautical drama, was produced at the Metropolitan Theatre. True to the Core is full of dramatic situations and startling effects, and therefore pleases the popular taste which craves rather scenes that will satisfy the eye than fine sentiments that will reach both the heart and the intellect. The plot of this play has been repeatedly published, and as everyone is going to see it, it is unnecessary to give an extended account of it. Mrs. Harry Jackson in the character of "Marah," the gypsey girl, carried off the honors of the play, repeatedly exciting the audience to the highest pitch of enthusiasm. Night after night she has, in the scene where she denounces the conspirators against "Martin Truegold's," been honored with three distinct rounds of applause. Alexander Fitzgerald quite gains the sympathies of the audience in the character of the honest pilot, and Miss Emma Howson as his bride brings down the house when she chooses death in preference to the dishonor of betraying her native land. "Pauline Conger" is really not qualified for the stage; she reads the very few lines which fall to her in the part of "Queen Elizabeth," in a sadly monotonous tone. Very often when people unsuited to the stage obtain a footing on it they stick there, remaining sticks until their death. Therefore I think it kind to criticise amateur actors and actresses who show no promise of attaining proficiency in the profession. The scenery of True to the Core is very fine, and does credit to Andrew Torning, the painter, whom we are too soon to loose, he intending shortly to go to Australia. At the close of each act the audience insist on the curtain being raised to afford them another view of the concluding tableaux. The ship scene, in which a vessel is engulphed by the waves, is always loudly applauded. It is a pity that this effect cannot be better managed, but up to the present time no better means of representing waves on the stage than the old "wave-cloth" has been discovered. The scene representing "Eddystone rock" is very good, and the tableau on which the drop scene falls is well arranged. The procession in which "Queen Elizabeth" makes her entry on horseback is a very popular feature, and the National Anthem of England which is played on the conclusion of the piece, affords intense delight to the many loyal Britishers who nightly attend. True to the Core is bound to have a long run in spite of the political excitement which reigns at present. Manager Howson has already commenced most elaborate preparations for the production of another play full of startling effects. Much time and money must be expended before it can be placed on the stage, but it will probably be ready before the public have tired of True to the Core. The usual matinee will be given to-day.

TOUCHSTONE.

A SEA-SHORE EXPERIENCE.

BY JOHN QUILL.

THE fact is, I am afflicted with fat woman. Adipose female is my complaint, and I've got it so bnd that sometimes I seriously think of throwing myself in the nndertow and floating out to become food for clams.

This is the way it occnrs: Yon see there is a man here whose father was acquainted with my father, and whose robnst pocket-book corresponds, comparatively, with the size of his danghter. She, forsooth, is a maiden who assumes to have seen but twenty summers, but she has put in the time so well that she has collected more beef and tissne, and so on, on her skeleton than would serve six ordinary women.

Well, you see, this heavy father has his eqnally heavy daughter on his hands, and he comes down here and lays for his chance to throw her over into matrimony with some unsuspecting man. In an evil hour I was indnced to borrow money from him, and now he threatens me with the sheriff or his daughter, whichever I choose. Of conrse, I prefer the sheriff, but I worry along with the fnt woman until I see a chance to bolt.

Yon have no idea how trying it is. Her name is Maria, and Maria is always wanting to go into bathe. So we go down to the beach, nnd I walk in her shadow to get out of the heat. When she comes to the bath honse, ten chances to one, that she nearly rips the clothes off of her trying to get throngh the door, and then, jnst as like as not, I've got to walk back and get a carpenter down and take out fonr or five planks so as to get her in, and then when she is in, it is necessary for me to stand there and hold those loose planks in place while she takes off her envelopes.

Then she comes ont and tries to trip lightly over the sands. Did you ever see the elephant dance at the circus? Well, that's her, she looks more like a molasses cask on two legs than anything else, and she's about as graceful as an ox.

And she wanted me to teach her how to swim. Wouldn't I hold her by the waist while she saw if she conld float? Waist? talk about pntting a girdle around the earth; about the eqnator, or the rings of Saturn! Why, I tell you you might as well try to embrace the dome of the capitol at Washington.

I got hold of her, and she laid over on her back to such an extent that it cansed a flood tide, and then her head went under, and she came np like an organ bellows.

"Time," said I; "boy comes up smiling."

But she conldn't appreciate innocent amusement, and she said if I tried to drown her she would tell her pa.

Blast her pa, a watery grave is jnst what he is suffering for.

Why didn't I hold her up? she said. I wasn't a Samson, I replied. I had never taken the prize at the gymnasium for lifting twelve hundred pounds. Who did she take me for? So she laid over again, and jnst then a breaker came, so that she lost her balance, and one of her legs np so that she kicked me on the nose. I don't see how she ever did it. It seems impossible.

Bnt she didn't care anything abont my agony. Indeed, I think she was prond of having drawn first blood for Maria, but she said nothing, except that she wanted to try floating again. But I believed I wonldn't go in for another chance; I was afraid she might roll over on me and flatten me ont.

Then she said she didn't believe I loved her. Would I swim out to save her if she was drowoing? she asked. I thonght not; I hadn't my life insured; and I never went whale fishing in my life. Besides, I wasn't a tug-boat, and had no horse-power about me.

When she came out you ought to have seen her. She left the bar high and dry all along the coast, and there was enongh water in her clothes to float an iron-clad.

Then you ought to see her at a hop. She has an idea she can dance, and when she expressed herself to this effect, I went down stairs to see the man who owns the place, and advised him as a friend to shore np the floor with any spare timber he might have around, for I knew if she got to hopping there would be an earthquake somewheres in that neighborhood sure.

She wears a gaiter that takes a whole side of leather, and if she once puts her foot oo yours, you are a helpless cripple for life; so I was unwell that night and couldn't daoce.

But she danced. She got her hands ou another of her pa's victims and tried to waltz with him.

Yon ought to have seen that man. You recollect when yon were a boy seeing other boys trying to climb very large and smooth chestnnt trees, with no branches within a quarter of a mile of yon. You know they could never get their grip on it. Just so with this fellow; he would clutch and grab for a hold on the place where Maria's waist ought to have been, but he would slip off every time, and you never saw a more miserable man in your life. I believe he committed suicide three days afterward.

She wanted me to drive her out in a carriage yesterday, but there wasn't a man on the island who was willing to take her. And they were right; no man wants his vehicle broken to pieces. So we went arouud to the lighthouse, and she insisted npon going up to the top, bnt the keeper, he said the thing was not very steady anyhow, and he didn't want it made top-heavy, and have any accidents happening while the Government debt is so large.

(If you can do anything for this man I will feel obliged. I consider him a valnable official.)

Would I take her ont in a yacht, and let her catch some fish there? she said. I told her no, there was no use, because there wasn't nny canal boats down here, and I didn't want her father to have to pay for raising any snnken yachts. But she had set her heart on it, so I bribed a man to take her out in a schooner.

It seemed to me we mnst have fished for a week without any good result. Excepting that a million or so green-headed flies gathered around Maria, and seemed to enjoy themselves cntting out chunks of snperfluous flesh.

I like these insects; they are intelligent animals; you jnst leave your green-headed fly alone to hnnt out good forging ground. They go right to the spot by instinct. When I got Maria home she was covered with blisters, nnd swelled to twice her natural size. The hotel man thought I was bringing home a mass meeting of woman's right convention with me.

But whnt am I to do? Here I am with this woman on my hands and no means of relief. Can't yon sue out a writ of habeas corpus and get the Government to send aronnd a fleet to bring the corpus home? Something has got to be done, or I'll die.—Philadelphia Sunday Transcript.

THE ORIGIN OF CATS.

THE Egyptians adored the cat as a divinity, and the Swiss have chosen it as a symbol of liberty. History rarely condescends to mention it, and the poets in general ignore it; for, however valnable its qualities, the cat is not poetical. Yet Goldsmith has given it a place in his exquisite "Hermit:"

> "Around in sympathetic mirth,
> Its tricks the kitten tries;
> The cricket chirrups in the hearth:
> The crackling fagot flies."

It is a common thing enough to call men "dogs," but Volumnia in "Coriolanus" calls them "cats." In speaking of her son, she says:

> "'Twas yon incensed the rabble;
> Cats! that can judge as fitly of his worth
> As I can of those mysteries which heaven
> Will not have earth to know."

As to "the brindled cat" that mewed thrice before the three witches in "Macbeth" entered the cave, we can only applaud Shakspeare's good taste in giving her the precedence in that grand scene.

For nearly a thousand years Western Christendom scarcely knew the blessing of cats; and how the rats and mice were kept down when no four-footed policemen patrolled the kitchen is more than we can guess. In the tenth and eleventh centnries very high prices were given for good mousers. They were of Nubian origin, and descended from those domestic cats which the Egyptians certainly possesed, which exist to onr own day in the form of mummies, and are represented on many monuments of Thebes No one knows how they found their way into Europe; bnt there is reason to believe that the Romans imported them from the banks of the Nile in small numbers and at rare intervals. Onr ancestors had so high a sense of the nselnlness of this animal that Howell Dha. or Howell the Good, inserted among his laws one expressly concerning it. The price of a kitling before it could see, was to be a penny, and when it had killed a mouse, twopence. If its seeing or hearing was imperfect, if it had not whole claws, did go on killing mice, or proved a bad mother, the the seller was to forfeit to the buyer the third part of its valne. If any one stole tho cat from the prince's granay, the fine he had to pay was a milch ewe, with her lamb and fleece, or as much wheat as would cover the cat when held by the tail with its head touchiog the floor. No reduction was to be made. The very tip of pussy's tail must be covered with the culprits wheat. Thus the price given for cats was high, cnnsidering the value of specie at that period, and the lact of laws being made to protect the breed of an animal which multiplies so fast, shows that in the Middle Ages it mnst have been scarce in Wales.

DOMESTIC HAPPINESS.—The great end of prudence is to give cheerfulness to those hours which splendor cannot gild, and acclamation cannot exhilarate. Those soft intervals of nnbended amusement, in which a man shrinks to his natnral dimensions, and throws aside the ornaments and disguises which he feels in privacy to be useless encumbrances, and to lose all effect when they become familiar. To be happy at home is the nntimate result of all ambition, the end to which every enterprise and labor tends, and of which every desire prompts the execution. It is indeed at home that every man must be knowu by those who would have a just estimate of his virtue or felicity; for smiles and embroidery are alike occasional, and the mind is ofteu dressed for show in painted honor and fictitious benevolence.

USE is indeed second nature. The rattle of a thousand trains fail to awaken the railway-sleeper.

DIRGE FOR A SAILOR.

> SLOW, slow! toll it low,
> As the sea waves break and flow;
> With the same dull slumberous motion
> As his ancient mother, Ocean,
> Rocked him on, through storm and calm,
> From the iceberg to the palm:
> So his drowsy ears may deem
> That the sound which breaks his dream
> Is the ever-moaning tide
> Washing on his vessel's side.
>
> Slow, slow! as we go,
> Swing his coffin to and fro;
> As of old the lusty billow
> Swayed him on his heaving pillow:
> So that he may fancy still,
> Climbing up the watery hill,
> Plunging in the watery vale,
> With her wide-distended sail,
> His good ship securely stands
> Onward to the golden lands.
>
> Slow, slow!—heave-a-ho!—
> Lower him to the mould below;
> With the well-known sailor ballad,
> Lest he grow more cold and pallid
> At the thought that Ocean's child,
> From his mother's arms beguiled,
> Must repose for countless years,
> Reft of all her briny tears,
> All the rights he owned by birth,
> In the dusty lap of earth.

SHORT BIOGRAPHY OF DEMOSTHENES.

BY THE FAT "CONTRIBUTOR."

THE celebrated orator, who has sometimes been compared to Wendell Phillips, was born near Athens, inheriting very little from his parents, with the exception of a delicate constitution and a first-rate name for an orator. Although he achieved the highest eminence as an orator before he sold out the business and retired to the country, yet his earliest attempts at public speaking were lamentable failures. He was led, weeping from the stage at six years, when he tried to repeat some verses at a Fourth of July Sunday School celebration.

Two or three years expired before he could overcome his natural timidity so far as to stand up before an audience again. It was at an exhibition of the district school, held in the old school house, where he was educated. He spoke the lines:

> "You'd scarce expect one of my age
> To speak in public, on the stage;
> But should I chance to fall below
> Demosthenes or"——

Here he hesitated, wriggled about, and applied a corner of his check apron to his eye. "Go on, Demmy," said the teacher, encouragingly.

"Demosthenes or"——

"Bo! ho! ho!" went young Demosthenes, totally overcome by the reference to himself and the striking novelty of the situation. He was laughed at a good deal by his schoolmates, which raised his spunk a considerable, and then he determined to become an orator anyhow. He had a great many difficulties to surmount. In addition to a naturally weak voice, he had an impediment in his speech. To overcome these drawbacks, he used to go out on the bowlder pike, fill his mouth with bowlders, and declaim. [An effort was made to induce him to substitute the Nicholson pavement, but being old-fogyish in his notions, he steadily refused.] He also declaimed to the waves of the sea as they dashed upon the beach, talked in boiler shops and nail factories, in order to accustom himself to Democratic Conventions and other tumultuous assemblies. He became very strong in his voice at length—so strong that he could lift hundreds of people right out of their seats with it. We don't know that he ever wholly overcame the hestation in his speech. There are few orators who acqure eminence but what have it occasionally. Wendell Phillips has been known to hesitate in his speech—until he was offered his price for making it.

Demosthenes came to be in great requisition as an orator, at length. Some of his Fourth of July orations are in use at School Exihitions to this day, particularly the one in which he exclaims: "Give me liberty or give me death; there she stands, look at her! His funeral oration over the body of Julius Cæsar was one of the finest specimens of graveyard eloqnence ever heard. Beadle published it in his dime songbook, and it had a great run.

Demosthenes was often urged to take the stump in politics, bnt he steadily refused. He always kept a lot of funeral orations on hand, however, to be read over defunct politicians. He accepted engagements to lecture before Lyceums one winter, but he wasn't a success. Lyceums were not accustomed to eloqnence at that early day, Greeley not having educated them up to the highest forms of it until years after.—Cincinnati Times.

RAILWAYS IN INDIA.—Railways in India are reported to be quite successful, and according to a report just issued on the operations of last year, the English capitalists who have invested in these roads have reason for encouragement. In spite of commercial depression and monetary disasters, of unprecedented floods and destructive inundations, the works under construction have steadily progressed and the traffic has increased.

ADVICES JUST RECEIVED BY MAIL ENABLE US to announce positively that the only gold medal for American Sewing Machines was awarded to Elias Howe, Jr., as the manufacturer of the best Sewing Machine that was exhibited There were eighty-two different Machines in competition for the prize, and Mr. Howe received the additional award of the Cross of the Legion of Honor, as manufacturer and inventor. The exact wording of the award is as follows:

HOWE MACHINE.	WHEELER & WILSON.
"Co operateur Elias Howe, Jr., promoteur de la Machine a coudre, Medaille d'or."	"Wheeler & Wilson, pour la machine a boutonniere, Medaille d'or."
TRANSLATION. Co-operator Elias Howe, Jr., improvement on Sewing Machines, Gold Medal.	TRANSLATION. Wheeler & Wilson, for Buttonhole Machine, Gold Medal.

The official list of those who were made Knights of the Legion of Honor, as published in the Paris papers, reads thus: "Mons. Elias Howe, Jr., fabricant de machines a coudre exposant." Which, translated into English, reads: "Elias Howe, Jr., maker of Sewing Machines, exhibiting."

From this it will be seen that the medal awarded to Wheeler & Wilson was for a "Buttonhole Machine," AND NOT FOR THE SEWING MACHINE.

H. A. DEMING, Agent,
No. 137 Kearny street, near Sutter.

An American Knight of the Legion of Honor—Among the many who have been the recipients of medals and honors at the Exhibition at Paris, none stand so high on the list as the celebrated inventor and manufacturer of Sewing Machines, Elias Howe, Jr. The Emperor, who shows great tact and discrimination in these matters, has made Mr. Howe a Knight of the Legion of Honor, and the jury on Sewing Machines, who had the task of testing and awarding prizes for excellence, unanimously decided that Mr. Howe was not only entitled to great honors as the inventor of the Sewing Machines, but that he carried off the palm as a manufacturer as well, and to him was awarded accordingly the first of the only two gold medals assigned this class. The numbers who have called upon Mr. Howe, at his office, No. 64 Regent street, to offer their congratulations, prove that many besides the Emperor and the jury acknowledge the justice of the claim.—The Courier, London, England.

No Mint in California.—Mr. Ferguson was once smitten with the "gold fever", in the early days of the California excitement, and after he had fully determined to seek his fortune in California, he was naturally anxions to gain all the information respecting the country that came within his reach. He chanced to meet a retnrned gold digger, and immediately began to ply him with questions on his favorite topic. The replies of the digger were highly satisfactory at first. He represented that by ordinary indnstry a large amount of gold could be collected in a short time.

"Bnt" continued he, after expatiating a while upon the richness of the deposits in the California streams, "the greatest drawback we find there is the want of a mint."

"No mint in California?" exclaimed Mr. Ferguson.

"No mint there," was the sententions reply.

"Horrid!" ejaculated Mr. Ferguson.

"Very bad," said the digger; "we can never realize the full benefit of the gold as long as there's no mint."

"Damnable!" still ejaculated Ferguson vehemently.

"If you go out there, "you must assist us in getting and establishing the mint," said the digger.

"Why, yes," replied Ferguson, I could carry ont seed, but it would take it such a d—l of a time to grow. No, stranger, you don't catch me in a country where there's no mint."

"Possible?"

No indeed, I'm not as green as that—realize the benefit of the gold without mint! I should rayther think I couldn't. Why, look here, stranger! how long do you suppose I could live in that hot climate without mint juleps?"

Here Mr. Ferguson siezed a straw and ordered the barkeeper to hurry np a couple of juleps "a little quicker than a couple of flashes of lightning."

Address of the People's Nominating Committee.

The undersigned, called together by their fellow citizens as an Independent Municipal Nominating Convention, for the purpose of recommeading to the suffrages of the people of this city candidates for the various municipal and judicial offices to be filled at the approaching September and October elections, herewith submit to the consideration of the public the foregoing Municipal ticket.

In discharge of the eerious duty assigned to us, we have sought to be guided solely by a sincere desire to secure the highest public good. In our eelections of men we have aimed to regard the qualificatious of the various candidates and their characters, and their qualifications and character alone, irrespective of our personal friendshipe or their polical affiliations.

We believe that the principle which should control all the citizens of San Francisco in the choice of their city officers ought to be this, and only this: "The right man in the right place:" and upon this principle we have endeavored to act in all our nomioations. We have attempted to be above prejudice and bias. We have tried to make careful and thorough investigation respecting each candidate presented, and to act with such wisdom as has been possessed by us, and our decisions have been made after what seemed to us due deliberation.

The result of our labors we now submit to you, fellow-citizens, in the hope that your approval of our action may be found in your hearty endorsement of the ticket now presented, and in the election of all the candidates appearing thereupon.

TO THE PEOPLE of CALIFORNIA

A CARD.

GEO. C. GORHAM ON CHINESE SUFFRAGE.

The following card over the signature of George C. Gorham, appears in the San Francisco Press, and is now republished to show the people of California how that gentleman, while claiming the suffrages of the people of the State for the highest office in their gift, can deny the truth of his owa published and recorded statements:

San Francisco, August 17, 1867.

H. J. Tilden, Esq., Chairman State Central Committee—Dear Sir:—A circular has met my eye in which it is stated that I favor Chinese Sufirage. As a final answer to all the din raised on this subject, I wish to say to the people of the State, through you, that I am not, and never have been in favor of the extension of the Suffrage to the Chinese.

The Democracy are reduced to desperate straits, when they find it necessary to reiterate the oft exploded falsehood contained in the Circular alluded to.

Please give this circulation in the Union papers, and have it advertised in the Sacramento Union and Bee, and San Francisco Bulletin and Morning Call.

(Signed) Yours, truly, GEO. C. GORHAM.

Proof of the Utter Falsity of this Card.

Gorham says to Colonel Gray, in reply to the celebrated Chinese letter of the latter gentleman, April 19, 1867:

"I (Gorham) believe in the universal brotherhood of man."

"I (Gorham) cannot believe that you (Gray), an old Republican of 1856, became so imbued with caste prejudices, while sitting as a delegate at the Philadelphia Convention, as to be ready to deny the right of man to the humblest of your fellow-creatures."

Gorham, in his published address to the people of California, June 18th, says:

"The war of opinion is not yet fought through. It is to go on until National Citizenship shall be beyond the control of local authority, and manhood alone be the test of a right to a voice in the Government."

Speaking of the amendment of the Federal Constitution, Gorham said at Platt's Hall, July 10th:

"If this change is made, it will obviate the necessity of an amendment to our State Constitution, which will otherwise soon be demanded by the popular sense of justice, enfranchising those of the United States resident in this State who are excluded from voting on account of color."

Gorham said at Platt's Hall, August 13th, that he "denounced the accursed heresy that this was a White Man's country alone. He respectfully requested that every man who feared the negro and Chinaman in competition should vote against him at the polls."

Thus stands George C. Gorham convicted by his own words; and no means of escape remains for him, except to deny that he ever wrote Colonel Gray, or published an address to the people, or a Card to the Chairman of his Committee, one or the other, or the whole of them.

If there is a Florence Sewing Machine within a thousand miles of San Francisco, that is not giving entire satisfaction, if I am informed of it, it will be attended to without express charge or expense of any kind to the owner. Samuel Hill, Agent, 111 Montgomery St., San Francisco.

WHAT HE SWALLOWED.—During the late war, while the Rebel Army of Tennessee, under General Johnson, lay encamped near Dalton, the following scene occured: There was a very popular dealer in newspapers there, a perfect Brobdignag in size, rivaling Daniel Lambert in rotundity of stomach. A regiment was there about to leave for Mobile, and our massive friend had some business to transact with the Colonel. So, puffing and blowing, he came up a few minutes before the train started As he came up a soldier spied him, and hollowed: "Boys, here he is." Instantly the whole regiment was on the alert, and shout after shout went up—"Here he is, here he is!" Looking dumbfounded, the fat man said: "What's up, gentlemen?" What have I done?" "You're the man that stole our big drum and swollowed it," cries the first speaker. "Denounce him to the Colonel!" says another. "Ah! Look at him, he can't deny it!" cries a third, amidst the guffaws of the boys, and the immoderate laughter of all spectators.

CLIPPER RESTAURANT.—The old Clipper has left her moorings and anchored on Sansome street near Pacific, under the command of Capt. John Stock. She will continue to be freighted with the best in the market. Stock stands A No. 1 as a commander and caterer to his thousands of passengers. Branch "Clipper" Restaurants are located at 504 Washington St., one door above Sansome, and 414 Market street between Sansome and Montgomery, where the best of the market can be obtained.

TO EPICURES.—There is considerable difference between a gourmand and a gourmet. In the gourmand the animal nature predominates, while the gourmet cultivates the sense of taste until it is rendered susceptible of receiving the highest gratification. The gourmand is satisfied to swill flat beer or sour wine, to eat ill-cooked viands, provided he can get enough to gorge himself withal. Epicures, or gourmets, who can appreciate the delicate bouquet of a fine wine as they delight in the perfume of the violet, should pay a visit to the store of F. C. Belden, No. 612 Sacramento street, where they will find the rarest brands of wines, spirits and liqueurs, the choicest teas and an immense assortment of delicacies, such as truffles, pate de fois gras, Stilton cheese, caviare, etc.

GRAND TRIAL
....OF....
SEWING MACHINES.

CONTEST BETWEEN THE
FLORENCE AND WILLCOX & GIBBS.

THE
WILLCOX & GIBBS
TRIUMPHANT!

At the Great UNION FAIR, held at Island Park, between Albany and Troy, in September, two Premiums were offered on Sewing Machines, one for the BEST and the other for the "Second Best"—competition being open to the State.

On the first day of the Fair, the Troy Agent of Florence Sewing Machine Company, having, jointly with the Albany Agent of the same Machine, entered it for competition, published in the Troy Daily Times a challenge to Agents of other Sewing Machines, to meet them at said Fair and compete with them for the Premium.

The challenge was accepted by the Troy and Albany Agents of the Willcox and Gibbs Machine.

Each party was to prepare and subject to the judges a "list" of the several "points of merit" on account of which "superiority" was claimed. These "points were to be separately considered, thoroughly investigated and practically tested, by work done then and there, upon each of the machines; and then decided in favor of the machine which was adjudged to excel on that "point."

Finally it was agreed that the machine which, at the conclusion of the trial, should be found to have the greatest number of those "points" decided in its favor should be decided the "BEST SEWING MACHINE," and awarded the FIRST PREMIUM.

The result of the trial was, that the

WILLCOX & GIBBS WON THE VICTORY

and the prize, by the extraordinary superiority of thirty-five points, decided in its favor, against two points in favor of the Florence.

Full notes were taken of the trial.

It is a fact worthy of remark, that during the entire trial—which continued without intermission for nearly seven hours—not a stitch was missed, nor the thread once broken, nor a needle broken or bent, by the Willcox and Gibbs machine. No kind of work was attempted to be done on it that was not accompliseed, and done in a perfect and workmanlike manner; and no effort was made on it that was not entirely successful; while neither of these statements can be truly made in favor of the Florence.

This remarkable trial can not fail, through the facts developed by it, to be productive of important results. It has raised the veil and exposed to public view the true character of the opposition, who will no longer be able to deceive the public by misrepresenting the character and merits of the Willcox and Gibbs machine.

It is an improvement on double thread machines; and its "stitch," which was severely tested by the Judges, was decided to be much stronger and less liable to rip in use or wear than the "Lock Stitch."

It is the simplest in construction—does the greatest variety of work—makes no noise—is not liable to get out of order—costs the least money, and gives the best satisfaction.

AYER'S

AGUE CURE,

FOR THE SPEEDY CURE OF

Intermittent Fever, or Fever and Ague, Remittent Fever, Dumb Ague, Periodical Headache, or Billious Fevers, indeed for the whole Class of Diseases originating in Biliary Derangement, Caused by the Malaria of Miasmatic Countries.

No one remedy is louder called for by the necessities of the American people than a sure and safe cure for Fever and Ague Such we are now enabled to offer, with a perfect certainty that it will eradicate the disease, and with assurance founded on proof, that no harm can arise from its use in any quantity.

That which protects from or prevents this disorder must be of immense service in the communities where it prevails. Prevention is better than cure, for the patient escapes the risk which he must run in violent attacks of this baleful distemper This "Cure" expels the miasmic poison of Fever and Ague from the system, and prevents the development of the disease, if taken on the first approach of the premonitary symptoms. It is not only the best remedy ever yet discovered for this class of complaints, but also the cheapest The large quantity we supply for a dollar brings it within reach of every body, and in the bilious districts, where Fever and Agun prevails, everybody should have it and use it freely both for cure and prevention. A great superiority of this remedy over any other ever discovered for the speedy and certain cure of Intermittents is, that it contains in Quinine or mineral, consequently it produces no quinsmo or other injurious effects whatever upon the constitution. Those cured by it are left as healthy as if they had never had the disease.

Fever and Ague is not alone the consequence of the miasmatic poison. A great variety of disorders arise from its irritation, among which are Neuralgia, Rheumatism, Gout, Headache, Bliudness, Toothache, Earache, Catarrh, Asthma, Palpitation, Painful Affection of the Spleen, Hystorics, Pain in the Bowels, Colic, Paralysis, and Derangement of the Stomach, all of which, when originating in this cause, put on the intermittent type, or become periodical. This "Cure" expels the poison from the blood, and consequently cures them all alike.

NEW REMEDIES! NEW REMEDIES!

Dr. Gibbon's Dispensary.

ESTABLISAED IN 1854,

616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco.

For the treatment of Sexual and Seminal Diseases, such as gonorrhœa, gleet, stricture, syphilis in all its forms, seminal weakness, impotency, &c. Skin Diseases, (of years' standing,) and Ulcerated legs, successfully treated.

HORRIBLE DISEASES.

How many thousands of persons both male and female are there who are suffering out a miserable existence from the effects of secret indulgence, or from virus absorbed into the system. Look at their pallid, emaciated and disfigured faces, and their broken constitutions, disqualifying them for the happiness of marriage or the enjoyment of life. In this horrid situation thousands suffer until death closes the scene. Let parents, guardians and friends, attend to those who are suffering with any of these horrible, life-destroying maladies—see that they are cared for and cured before it be too late. Send them to Dr. Gibbon, a physician who has made private diseases his especial study for years, and who is certain to cure the most inveterate cases without mercury or any injurious drugs. It is important to those who are afflicted, to be careful of the many pretended Doctors who infest all cities, publishing their skill in curing all diseases in a few days, imposing upon the public by using the names of eminent physicians from Europe and other places. Be therefore careful and make strict inquiry, or you may fall into the hands of these charlatans.

Syphilis is syphilis the world over; so is small pox, consumption, and other diseases, to the contrary of what quacks may say.

SEMINAL WEAKNESS.

Seminal weakness the consequent of self abuse. This solitary vice, or depraved sexual indulgence, is practiced by the youth of both sexes to an almost unlimited extent, producing with unerring certainty the following train of morbid symptoms, unless combatted by scientific medical measure; sallow countenances, dark spots under the eyes, pain in the head, ringing in the ears, noise like the rustling of leaves and rattling of chariots, uneasiues about the loins, weakness of the limbs, confused vision, blunt intellect, loss of confidence, dilidence in approaching strangers, a dislike to form new acquaintances, a disposition to shun society, loss of memory, bectic flushes, pimples and various eruptions about the face, furred tongue, fetid breath, coughs, consumption, night sweats, monomania, and frequent insanity. If relief be not obtained, should apply immediately, either in person or by letter, and have a cure effected by his new and scientific mode of treating this complaint, which never fails of effecting a quick and radical cure. Dr. G. will give $100 to any person who will prove satisfactorily to him that he was cured by either of the San Francisco quacks.

Dr. Gibbon is responsible, and will give each patient a written instrument binding himself to effect a radical and permaneut cure or make no charge.

Persons at a distance may be cured at home by addressing a letter to Dr. Gibbon, stating case, symptoms, length of time the disease has continued, and have medicine promptly forwarded, free from damage and curiosity, to any part of the country, with full and plain directions for use, for ten dollars, sent in a registered letter, or through Wells, Fargo & Co.

Address DR. J. F. GIBBON, 616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco, Postoffice Box 252.

CAUTION TO THE UNFORTUNATE.

Beware of the San Francisco quacks and pretenders who with bogus sworn-to certificates, dupe the unwary. Some of the self styled doctors whose names are to be found in all the daily and weekly papers of San Francisco and other places, are tradesmen, and become too lazy to work at their trade. Some are tinsmiths, shoemakers, newspaper carriers, intelligence offices keepers, etc. Look over the San Francisco City Directory and you will find their former occupation in it. Look at the Directory for 1862-63. The only way to avoid imposition is make inquiry—it will cost you nothing and may save you many regrets, for advertising physicians in eight cases out of ten are bogus, there is no safety in trusting any of them till you know who and what they are. Dr. Gibbon does not deceive people by exhibiting bogus titles, certificates, pretended patients' letters, etc. Dr. Gibbon Will satisfy persons who may call at his office of his ability to treat diseases that he proposes to cure.

☞ Persons writing to Dr. Gibbon will Please state the name of the paper they see his advertisement in.

BABBITTONIAN,

OR SELF-TEACHING

PENMANSHIP

The System of Babbitonian Penmanship is pre-eminently self-instructing. With its ample explanations of right and wrong forms—its sixty wood cuts—its plain intelligent rules, one may sit down by his own fireside and become a finer Penman than he could at much greater cost in the usual way with a living teacher.

There is a great demand for fine Penmen in the commercial world, and this system, at a trifling expense, imparts a skilful command of the Pen, worth hundreds of dollars to the fortunate possessor.

Penmanship is an indispensable accomplishment to Ladies, and this system is elaborate in a series of elegant copies in the Ladies' Style.

Business men have sometimes lost thousands of dollars from ignorance in regard to Business forms, and there is furnished in a set, without additional charge, a fine variety of Business Forms and Abbreviations. To sum up the Excellencies of this System, it is—

1—Scentific in its Arrangement of Principles;
2—Artistic in its Movements and Flourishes;
3—Practical in its Combinations and Applications;
4—Stylish in its neat and chaste Gracefulness;
5—Superior for Legibility, Rapidity and Beauty;
6—Most Disciplinary for fingers, Arms and Muscles.
7—Unexcelled for Comprehensiveness and Simplicity.
8—Complete and Self-Teaching for Private Learners;
9—Time, Labor and Expense Saving for Pupils and Teachers.

The Babbitonian Penmanship

Is published on durable card-board slips, ninety-two copies illustrated, put in a neat package with a Chart, the whole complete at the low price of $1 50.

Babbittonian Pens.

One reason why the country is flooded with poor Pens is that they are generally made by mechanics, rather than by artistic and experienced Penmen, the only parties really understanding the requirements of a good article.

The Babbittonian Pens,

Made in the most finished style, by skilful artisans, after models prepared according to the combined wisdom and experience of several amatsurs and old Professors of Penmanship, are admirably adapted to meet the public wants.

The Babbittonian Ladies' Pen,

Is one of the most exquisite little instruments for delicate writing ever constructed.

The Babbittonian Extra Fine Pen,

Is pronounced by a large number of Penmen to be more free, more durable, and more varied in capacity for either fine or coarse strokes than any foreign Pen whatever. Suitable for elegant writing, it is a great favorite with the ladies and gentlemen.

The Babbittonian Business Pen,

Having great freedom and variety of movement, is unequaled for general business or school purposes. Somewhat coarser than the Extra Fine, it wears longer and moves more easily on paper.

☞This Pen is now in use in the large countinghouses and banks in this city.

A RARE GEM OF ART.

"The Lord's Prayer,"

A pen drawing, by Mr. D. F. Brown, is one of the most remarkable works of art ever exhibited in this country. By patient labor he has succeeded in producing a design which for skill and beauty of execution, exquisite softness and delicacy of finish, and general merit, it would seem scarcely possible to surpass. The central figure—the face of our savior—is one of marvelous power and beauty. This and the faces of the Twelve Apostles, forming the border of the piece, are faithful copies from Leonardo da Vinci's famous painting of the

LAST SUPPER,

Reproducing, with the softest and most perfect shadings, the conceptions and characteristic expressions of the originals. Within this enclosure the words of the Lord's Prayer, in ornamental letters of various original designs and exquisite finish, are an interesting study of art in themselves; while appropriately distributed among these, miniture groups and scenes of marked events of Savior's life, copied from the great masters—five of them from Raphel a celebrated designs—form a harmonious completion of this unique, beautiful and truly wonderful work. The faces of

OUR LORD AND HIS APOSTLES.

Alone, so finely copied, would be a treasure in any house, and worth the full price of subscription.

FROM
HENRY H. HAIGHT.

THE STATEMENT MADE BY MR. T. G. PHELPS in his San Francisco speech, that I was a Whig in 1847, a Know-Nothing in 1855, and an Abolitionist in 1859, is destitute of truth in each and all its parts. I have not been a Whig since I was twenty-one years of age; I never was a Know-Nothing, never approved of that organization, and never voted their ticket; nor was I ever an Abolitionist. I am not aware of anything which could excuse such a statement on the part of Mr. Phelps.

City Gossip.

STODDARD'S WOODPECKER.—Brother Ridge, of the Grass Valley National, growls at Stoddard's "Woodpecker." He growls more especially at the Bulletin for calling the "Woodpecker" a perfect conceit. In the annalyzntion of the merits of this production, Brother Ridge shows great knowledge of the manners and customs of woodpeckers. Referring to the last line of the first verse, which reads thus: "What would you call such a curious monk as he?" Brother Ridge denies that the woodpecker is a monk. Substantially, Brother Ridge talks thus: "My boy, you may be able to write poetry some, but you don't know woodpeckers as well as I do." In intervals of leisure while resting from duties editorial, I, forseeing the probability that you might some time write a poem on woodpeckers, have made a study of this interesting bird. Not only have I studied the woodpecker, but in view of similar contingencies, I've studied everything in the four legged, two legged, feathered, swimming and creeping kingdom of nature. I have got all the idiosyncracies and peculiarities of dogs, cats, bop toads, worms and bumble bees. I'm after you, my boy. The woodpecker isn't a monk. Woodpeckers build nests, lay eggs, have families and moult. Monks neither lay eggs, have families or moult. Consequently, the monk is neither a woodpecker nor the woodpecker a monk.

Speaking of the lines, "Does he ever think of the bloom in the acorn's heart? Though shut in a tomb, there's life cherished there still." Brother Ridge gravely observes "Now, the truth is, as every reader of natural history must know, the woodpecker does not eat the acorn, but the worms which grow in it when it decays or when in the process of decay. Nothing can sprout from the acorn in that place like a catacombed hall where the woodpecker puts it."

Brother Ridge talks and reasons thus: "What business has a boy to write poetry who knows so little of the woodpeckers diet. The Diet of worms. Acorns are not good to subsist upon wholly. They are astringent and internally would affect the woodpecker in an unpleasant manner. Mr. Stoddard may be able to write poetry, but worms, woodpeckers, and more particularly, acorns are my speciality, and I want no intrusion."

FLOWING HAIR.—The abominable balls in the rear of the feminine caput, are giving place to the wearing of the hair loose, flowing, and free. So doth one extreme follow another. The change is most welcome. It is pleasant to see "the glory of a woman" falling over her shoulders like a silken woof, and waving in the breeze with a tantalizing sort of abandonment. True, in the height and fury of our San Francisco gales, it may "stick right straight out," but that is better far than the sight of those miserable Scotch snuff bladders.

CITY GUARD PICNIC.—We have received an invitation to be present at the Fourteenth Target Excursion and Picnic of the City Guard, Capt. G. W. Granniss, at the Encinal Park, Alameda, to-day. Most assuredly we will be there. These military picnics are very pleasant affairs, save and except where you happen to know nobody, and nobody knows you, which has often been our position on such occasion. Our lugubrious countenance bearing all over it the shattered remains of early piety, will reveal our identity.

A SUBMISSIVE AND DISGUSTED REBEL.—Mr. McFluster did not vote at the election last Wednesday. He could not exercise that privilege, having neglected getting registered. I expostulated with him, but Mr. McFluster, over his fourth glass of beer, broke out thus:

"Well, who wants to be registered? Who wants to vote? Not I. I'm out. I glory in it. I'm a voluntary alien, an American foreigner!"

"Why do you adopt this course?" said I.

"For two reasons. I admire consistency. I would myself be consistent. I will be consistent. During the war, I was a rebel. I opposed the government. The government opposed me—as it turned out, successfully. Hence, I consider I have now no voice in this matter. I submit, and am willing to be governed as the ruling Republican powers see fit to govern me. Sir, the audaciousness of my brother Democrats in turning around so soon after our grand failure, and coolly, aye, frigidly, asking for office, amazes me."

"But do you not covet the privilege of exercising the right of suffrage?"

Then Mr. McFluster burst out stronger than ever.

"Privilege! Do you think I call it a privilege to help staff a box with paper once a year or oftener? Do you imagine I'm hoodwinked into the belief that I have a voice in the election of this or that man for office? Do I engineer the primaries? Or the County Conventions? Or the State National Conventions? If I did I might boast of having a voice in the government."

"But have you no duties as a citizen, Mr. McFluster?"

"Citizen! What have miserable citizens to do with this government? Who is it making all this eternal fuss about principles and platforms? Do plain Jack, John or Bill Smith engaged in the cultivation of their potatoes and cabbages, take such an absorbing interest in the welfare of the country? Who kicked up the last war? Who threatens to kick up another? A lot, sir, of garrulous editors and pipe-laying office seekers. The potatoe and cabbage growing Smiths want no more war on any account. They don't want their potatoe patches destroyed, their hen-roosts robbed, their houses burned over their heads, and themselves drafted into the army, and shot or waylaid out of the army and shot by murdersome guerrillas."

"But must we not have some sort of government?"

"Government! We've got too much government! That's what's the matter. We've got on the brain the great American idea, that the people were created for the government, and not the government for the people. What seems to be the office of government now-a-days? To protect us? No. To protect and support office holders. That's all. Are we not continually being robbed and murdered, and highwayed and burglared? The very machinery of government, sir, is used for legal highwaying, robbing us of our lands, and jerking our farms and city property right from under our feet. We were better off in '49.' Then we hadn't much of any government, at least in the mines. We left our gold, and silver, too, laying around loose. When we caught a thief the people, not the government, took charge of him, and promptly strung him up. What if sometimes we did hang the wrong man? Somebody, most likely, that needed hanging. Contrast the difference, sir, with the manner in which robbers and murderers now are treated who can own a sack of cash."

"Well, does not the law cause their arrest."

"Yes, it arrest them, and, after arresting, it hems and haws and dallies and delays, and finds extenuating circumstances, and whittles the butt end of the crime down to a fine point, envelopes it in a mist of legal obscurity, magnetizes the public into indifference or carelessness concerning the matter, and the first thing one knows after the man has been condemned to death or imprisonment for life, somebody opens for him a side door, whispers to him 'git,' he does 'git,' and that's the last of him. Too much government, sir, peddled out by professional politicians. The people are confused with laws, ordinances, constitutions, statutes, amendments, acts to amend acts, and amendments to amend amendments. I'm disgusted. I surrender all my privileges into the hands of the editors and politicians. In fact, sir, they always held them. They vote me no longer. I wash my hand of the government. Personally, I'm an independent republic!"

Did you ever hear of such an inconsistent man?

RATS AND LANDMARKS.—The rats are being seriously disturbed at the corner of Commercial and Leidesdorff streets by the tearing down of those old cloth and paper buildings erected after the great fire of "51."

"Whither shall we emigrate," said old Gnawdoor to his venerable compatriot Robcheese, as they sat together at the mouth of their hole listening to the ripping up of shingles, the dislocation of joists, and all the destructive and ominous racket.

"Verily, I know not," said Robcheese. "I have thought of Telegraph Hill, but even that nuisance is being gradually removed. I have a mind to get me a lot in the outside lands, where there is pence if not plenty."

"Peace, indeed!" said Gnawdoor. "You'll be outside in six months by a decision of the Supreme Court."

Just then, there fell near these two aged inhabitants, an immense mass of lath and plaster, and frightened nearly out of their wits, they whisked, pell-mell, with twinkling tails, into their holes.

THE ELECTION.—It is over. In the name of the prophet—Haight. Even now is the excitement dying away, and those who fed upon it are beginning to feel, even as a boy on the day after the Fourth. Whilst the dead are being buried, the groans of the wounded paying their bets, still fall painfully on our ears. Democracy is victorious. H. H. H is elected, and Gorham defeated, yet steadily as ever turns the earth on its axis, and calmly as in the days of the unsophisticated patriarchs moves the planet in its resistless course around the sun, just as if neither of these great men, who, for the last few weeks had never existed, never been voted for, never been abused.

Freedom of the Press.

Not long since, Ben Nickerson rose in the National Republican Convention to complain of a breach of privilege committed by the reporter of the Alta, that gentleman having said that he possessed mobile features, and made other comments on his personal appearance. Ben Nickerson wished the reporter to be excluded from all future meetings as a punishment for having thus insulted a delegate to the National Republican Convention. He did not gain his point. On Thursday, July 25, the Marquis of Westmeath made as great a mistake in the English House of Lords as did Ben Nickerson in the National Republican Convention. He drew attention to a serious breach of privilege on the part of one of the reporters in the gallery of the House. In a speech recently delivered by him, (the noble Marquis,) he had found it necessary to make certain observations which had been greatly mutilated and misrepresented in one of the public prints. In addition, language had been used respecting him in the reporters' gallery, heard by a friend of his, (Mr. Edward Harper,) who was sitting in the strangers' gallery. Mr. Harper had furnished him with a statement of what took place. He met two reporters going into their room, and one said, "There's that d—d old idiot, Westmeath; but I'll take care not to give him much in to-morrow's paper, I'll cut him short." (Shouts of laughter.) On getting into the gallery, one of the reporters said, "I wish somebody would send this confounded old idiot to the asylum." (Renewed shouts of laughter.)

The Earl of Malmesbury rose, and said that as this matter was beneath the diguity of the House, he would advise the noble Marquis not to go on further with the matter.

The Marquis of Wesmeath said it was a serious matter, and one which should be gone into. It was not because it was personal to himself. He would now conclude briefly. He ought not to be shouted down when he was clearing himself.

The Earl of Malmesbury said that as there was no motion before the House, it was out of order thus to proceed.

The noble Marquis again attempted to obtain a hearing, but was compelled to sit down amid loud cries of order.

Ben Nickerson should write a letter of condolence to the Marquis of Westmeath, and tell him that the reporters in Conventions here are no more respectful towards speakers than those in the House of Lords in England. For ourselves, we are decidedly of opinion that the freedom of the Press should be restrained, when one reporter calls the Marquis of Westmeath a "d—d old idiot," but refrains from writing him down so by "mutilating" his speech, and another declares that Ben Nickerson has "mobile features."

The "Flag" on the Late Political Victory.

The Flag is an extraordinary paper. We always supposed that it was opposed to the Democratic party, though of late it has shown some desire to fraternize with the Examiner. We were not prepared to find the late Democratic victory characterized in the following terms the day after election:

"The victory just won has been eminently a moral triumph—a vindication of the right against the wrong; of educated intelligence over brutal propensities; of religion over vice; of progress over barbarism."

We consider the above a little too hard on the Gorhamites, though there is no doubt much truth in it. Then the Flag in the most jubilant spirit exclaims:

"It is settled that the American people are inexorably resolved to prove true to their most sacred obligations; that those who are to come after us, to fill the places which we now fill, are not to be defranded of the heritage recurred by us from the fathers to be transmitted unimpaired to our children; but that they are still, as a great and prosperous people, constituting one mighty nation, to enjoy on this Western continent, through long generations, the priceless blessings of freedom and union of good government, and civil and religious liberty."

We trust it may be so. There is certainly more chance of California being righteously governed by Henry H. Haight than there would have been had George Gorham been elected. There is really a good deal of sense in the Flag's remarks, and it shows a generous spirit in thus sympathizing with the triumph of what was but lately an antagonistic party.

Asking a Little too Much.

The following advertisement appeared in the Alta several times this week:

A CARD.—The public are requested to read the leading editorial in the ALTA of August 27th, and oblige

A LOVER OF HIS COUNTRY.

Of course every one would be glad to do anything in reason to oblige "A Lover of his Country;" but it is a little too much to ask a man to hunt up old Altas and read them editorials in them. Does any one ever remember the subject of the editorial in yesterday's Alta? We are very sorry; we would do anything in reason to oblige "A Lover of his Country;" but we cannot do this. If committing a page of Webster's dictionary, or performing any like tedious task, would add to the happiness of "A Lover of his Country;" we might attempt the task; but read one of the Alta's old leaders! Not if we know ourselves.

Good Gracious!

Five hundred and seventy-five times have we read that paragraph which informs us that their is an old farmer, in Northern Ohio, who gets up at daylight, builds the fire, puts on the tea-kettle, dusts the furniture, goes out to the stable and feeds the horses and then calls the folks. The name of this diabolically active old farmer is, as we are informed by five hundred and seventy-five newspapers, Ben Wade. And this man is Vice-President of the United States!

A FEW GHOST STORIES.

HISTORY bears out the bold assertion that there are few things in the world easier to accomplish than a declared impossibility. Any gentleman addicted to compilation might produce, in a very short space of time, a handsome volume descriptive of schemes and theories which—during, say, the last hundred years—have been authoritatively pronounced impracticable—are now in full swing, and provoke no more astonishment than the phenomenon of the telegraph.

The key to every scientific mystery is not hung up outside the door. It is found in unlikely corners. It has to be scrubbed, fitted, tested, till, freed from the rust of disbelief, it suddenly slips into the corresponding socket, and a vast new sphere lies enfranchised before the student's delighted eyes.

Let us come to the point at issue. Can the spirits of the departed reveal themselves, under any conceivable conditions, to the outward senses? To collate the mighty mass of testimony adducible in favor of such a possibility, would occupy an average lifetime; and then, where is the Solomon who shall decide? It is a question of veracity—of impression. Ghosts give no certificate, leave no mark, save on the mind and memory of the ghost seer, and this mysterious countersign is lost to all but him. Is it possible that pure spirit can communicate with spirit still incorporate, and that through the channels which are characteristic of this present state of being? Is it not possible that, in that conclusive moment which separates soul and body, there may be evolved a transient condition of being, which, neither body nor spirit—semi-material—possesses some of the attributes of both? It may be regarded as the veil of the disembodied spirit—a fluid vaporous essence, invisible in its normal state—but, for the brief space of its new condition, exercising some of the properties of matter.

If it be objected that this fluid substance, in a form so subtle, can in no wise act on matter—cannot influence eye or ear—how is it that, from the most subtle fluids—electricity, for example—are ordained the most powerful agents? or why do mere changes of light exercise chemical action upon ponderable substances?

Granting the possibility of the existence of such a transition state, the supernatural features would be referable to the circumstance that the spirit, as the surviving and superior essence, accomplishing what was impracticable while it was wholly clad in clay, might annihilate time and space, and, in the image and reflex of the form from which it has hardly departed, be itself the bearer of the tidings of dissolution. Who can say but that these mysterious visitations, instead of being, as some allege, the suspension or supercession of natural laws, may prove to be rather the complete fulfillment of one of the most beautiful and interesting of the marvellous code?

Let us see how far the theory thus hastily sketched out is applicable to known examples.

If we commence with an instance so familiar to many readers as the famous "Lyttelton ghost," it is because that singular narrative supplies us with a double apparation—because, though related in many a mutilated form, it has never, to the writer's knowledge, been given entire—and because his—the writer's—mother, when a girl, heard it from the lips of an actor in the tale, Mr. Miles Peter Andrews—a frequent guest of her father, Sir G. P., of Theobald's Park, Herts. Sir G. suffered much from gout, and the hours of the establishment were usually early, but, on the occasion of Mr. Andrews' visits, no one stirred till midnight. It was five minutes before that hour that Lord Lyttelton's ghost had appeared to him; and though, at the time we speak of, fifteen years had elapsed, he was not wholly free from certain nervous emotions, which made him prefer to pass that never-forgotten moment in company.

It was in or about the year 1775 that Lord Lyttelton, while resident at Hagley Park, made the acquaintance of a family living a short distance off, at Clent, and consisting of the father, mother, son, and four daughters, of whom the eldest was married to a Mr. Cameron, and had, it was said, demeaned herself in a manner to create some scandal.

Upon the death of the father of the family, which occurred in June, 1778, the intimacy increased, and the gay and agreeable lord was firmly established in the good graces of his "Clentiles," as he called them, to whom on New Year's Day, 1779—the last he was destined to see—he addressed an epistle burlesquing, with more wit than propriety, the language of apostolic writings.

Accepting the address in the spirit its author no doubt intended, the unsuspicious mother not only red it to her children, but encouraged the visits of the supposed moralist, until the young ladies, to the astonishment of all who knew Lord Lyttelton's real character, were seen actually residing at Hagely Park! The mother's eyes were now open, but too late. She had lost control of the girls, and when, in September of this fatal year, 1779, Miss Christian accompanied his lordship to Ireland, an Irish lady being of the party, the consciousness of her own indiscretion threw the unhappy lady into an illness from which she never recovered.

Early in November the party returned from Ireland, and being met by the two other sisters who had remained at Hagley Park, all went together to reside at Lord Lyttelton's town mansion, situated in Hill street, Berkeley square. Here, on the night of Thursday, the 26th of November, occurred the famous vision, which, whether or not it may be held to connect itself with the event it purported to forshadow, certainly rests upon evidence too strong to admit of rational question.

Lord Lyttelton's bedroom bell was heard to ring with unusual violence, and his servant, hastily obeying the summons, found him looking much disordered. He explained that he had been awakened by something resembling a fluttering white bird. Having, with some difficulty, driven this object away, he had been still more startled by the apperance of a figure in long white drapery—a woman of majestic presence—the image (as he afterwards averred) of the mother of his young gusts.

"Prepare to die, my lord," said the apparition; "you will quickly be called."

"How soon—how soon?" Lord Lyttolton had eagerly asked. "In three years?"

"Three Years!" was the stern rejoinder. "Three days. Within that time you will be in the state of the departed."

The figure vanished.

The incident made a deep impression on his lordship's mind. Making no secret of what had occurred, he related it not only to the party in his house, but to many friends—among others, to Lords Sandys and Westcote. The latter, who was a connexion, and, after Lord Lyttelton, the representative of the house, made light of the matter, and advised him to devote his thoughts, preferably, to a speech he was to make in parliament a few days later.

Lord Sandys gave better counsel. "My dear fellow, if you believe this strange occurrence, and would have us believe it, be persuaded to make some change in your doings. Give up, by all means, that silly frolic you told us of—I mean, of going next Sunday, I think, in Woodcote. But I suppose it is only one of your fine devices to make us plain people stare. So drink a cup of chocolate, and talk of something else."

The "frolic" alluded to by Lord Sandys was a projected visit, on the Sunday following, to Woodcote, or, as it has been more recently called, Pit-place—a country seat at Epsom, stated to have been won by Lord Lyttelton from Lord Foley at play.

That the apparition was discussed in the interval is further attested by Madame Piozzi.

"On Saturday, a lady from Wales dropped in, and told us she had been at Drury Lane last night. 'How were you entertained?' said I. 'Very strangely indeed,' was the reply; 'not with the play, though, for I scarce knew what they acted, but with the discourse of a Captain Ascough, or Askew—so his companions called him—who averred that a friend of his, the profligate Lord Lyttelton, as I understood by them, had certainly seen a spirit, who has warned him that he is to die within the next three days, and I have thought of nothing else ever since.'"

No further accounts reached the Thrales until Monday morning, when the return of the scared party of guests from Epsom brought the first tidings of their entertainer's death.

Not quite the first. On the Sunday night, Mr. M. P. Andrews, who had been invited to join the mad party to Woodcote, but had declined on account of an engagement to the Pigous, in Hertfordshire, had retired to bed at the mansion of the latter. At a few minutes before twelve—so he was accustomed to relate—Lord Littolton "thrust himself between the curtains, dressed in the yellow nightgown in which he used to read, and said, in a mournful tone, 'Ah, Andrews, it's all over!' 'O,' replied I, quickly, 'are you there, you dog?' and, recollecting there was but one door to the room, rushed out at it, locked it, and held the key in my hand, calling to the housekeeper and butler, whose voices I could hear, to ask when Lord Lyttelton arrived, and what trick he was meditating. The servants made answer, with much amazement, that no such arrival had taken place; but I assured them I had seen and spoken to him, and could produce him; 'For here,' said I, 'he is, safe under lock and key.' We opened the door, and found no one."

Let us see what at that precise moment was passing in Surrey. According to the testimony of Williams, Lord Lyttelton's valet, whose story never varied in the slightest degree, and was confirmed in every particular by Captain Ascough, the party had arrived from London in the highest spirits, and, being joined by young people of the county, prolonged their merriment until past eleven. Soon after that hour, Lord Lyttelton, looking at his watch, observed:

"Well, now I must leave you, agreeable as you all are. I must meditate on next Wednesday's speech. I have actually brought some books with me!"

"But the ghost—the ghost!" exclaimed one of the careless party, laughing.

"Oh, don't you see that we have bilked the ——?" (a coarse expression,) returned his lordship. (Another of the party affirmed that he had said "jockeyed the ghost."

He escaped from them, ran up to his chamber—one of the smaller—still shown at Pit-place as the "carved chamber," from the carved oaken facing to the doors. His servant had placed the reading-table, lamp, etc., and assisted his master to put on his yellow gown.

Lord Lyttelton then said: "Make up my five grains of rhubarb and peppermint-water, and leave me. But did you remember to bring rolls enough from London?"

"I brought none, my lord. I have found a baker here, at Epsom, who makes them just as your lordship likes." He was stirring the mixture as he spoke.

"What's that you are using? A toothpick? You lazy devil, go fetch a spoon directly."

Williams hastened away, but had hardly quitted the room when a loud noise recalled him. His master had fallen sideways across the table, bringing it, books, lamp and all, to the ground. He raised him.

"Speak to me, my lord. My dear lord, speak!"

The dying man gasped and strove to answer, but "Ah, Williams!" were the only intelligible words, and these were his last.

Williams, his watch in hand, flew down to the revellers below.

"Not twelve o'clock yet" (it wanted five minutes), "and dead—dead!"

It remains to be added that, owing to circumstances never fully explained, tidings of the death of their mother, on the Thursday night preceding, only met the young ladies on their arrival in town on that dismal Monday.

The coincidence of the result with the previously announced prophecy, suggested to the incredulous an idea that Lord Littelton had determined on self-destruction. A hundred circumstances united to negative this mode of explanation. Of a genial, easy temperament, immersed in the excitement of politics, a successful gambler and turfite, in a position of great prosperity, Lord Lyttelton could have had little inducement, at the age of thirty-six, to terminate a life which, to a man of his feelings and principles, left nothing to desire.

If, then, such a theory as has been suggested at the beginning of this paper may be regarded as possible, is it not under circumstances like these it might be found taking practical form? To whom would the dying thoughts of the heart-broken mother so naturally turn as to him who had broken up a respectable home, blasted her children's fair fame, and laid her on that couch, alone, to die? As for the solemn augury uttered by the visionary form, we know with what strange prophecy the words of the dying have been found fraught. How much more may not be imparted to them, as the speaker stands so much nearer infallible truth, as on the very boundary-line betwixt the beings?

With the single additional remark that Mr. M. P Andrews always declared that a compact existed between Lord Lyttelton and himself, that whichever departed first should visit the other, we turn to incidents of kindred character, but more recent date.

Several years ago (so commences a story related to the writer by a lady well known in London society), the brother of Colonel C. was killed in battle, leaving a widow and one little girl.

The widow subsequently married a German baron, and the little girl Maud, was brought up entirely in Germany. The latter was about twelve years old, when her mother, being attacked with an illness that threatened to prove fatal, became very uneasy about the probable future of her child, and feeling, one evening, more depressed than usual, called the little Maud to her bedside. She warned her that their parting was near, and enjoined the weeping girl to write immediately to Mrs. B. (a friend of many years' standing), entreating her to come at once, to receive her last embrace, and take charge of her orphan child.

Maud obeyed without delay, but the dying woman's eyes were not gladdened by the appearance of her friend. The summons had reached its destination, but the absence of her husband, without whom she felt unwilling to travel so far, had induced Mrs. B. to postpone her departure, consoling herself with the hope that her friend, being naturally of a nervous and desponding temperament had somewhat magnified her own danger.

Mrs. B. resided at Hampton Court, and here it was that, on the night of the ninth of November, a curious incident occurred. Retiring to her room between eleven and twelve, she rang for her maid, and the latter not appearing as promptly as usual, went to her still-open door to listen if she was coming. Opposite to her was a wide staircase, and up this came, noiselessly, a figure which the lamp held by Mrs. B. showed to be that of a lady dressed in black—with white gloves. A singular tremor seized her. She could neither stir nor speak. Slowly the figure approached her, reached the landing, made a step forward, and seemed to cast itself on her neck; but no sensation accompanied the movement! The light fell from her hand; she uttered a shriek that alarmed the house, and fell senseless on the floor.

On recovering, Mrs. B. related minutely what she had seen, her memory especially, retaining the image of the white gloves; but nothing more than the usual unsatisfactory solutions were propounded, nor does it appear that the occurrence was at all associated with the dying baroness in Germany.

In a few days, however, came a letter from little Maud, announcing that her mother was no more, that her latest thoughts were directed to Mrs. B., and her sole regrets she not being permitted to embrace her before her spirit passed away. She had died a little before midnight on the ninth of November.

Mrs. B. hastened to Germany to claim her orphan charge, and then was added a noteworthy confirmation of the vision. Little Maud, in one of their conversations, observed :

" Mamma had a curious fancy. On the night she died, she made the baron promise that she should be buried in her black satin dress—with white kid gloves."

The request had been complied with.

The following example is of yet more recent occurrence, and took place in one of the large and fashionable mansions in the district of South Kensington, which had been taken by a family whose name can only be designated by the initial L·

On the first night of their occupation, the lady of the house, while arranging her hair at the glass, saw in the latter the reflection of the figure of a man. He was old, of strange appearance, and was seated in an arm-chair that stood near her bed. He wore a gray coat with a cape, and had spectacles.

The lady possessed strong nerves, and after the first moment of surprise, finding that the spectrum did not disappear, came to the conclusion that her vision was affected by some disarrangement in the system. Resolved to test it, she turned calmly round, walked straight to the mysterious object, and sat down upon its very knees! She found herself alone in the chair.

The next morning she sent for her doctor, and related to him what had occurred, laughing merrily at the remembrance of her visitor's grotesque appearance. Observing that the doctor hardly participated in her mirth, she inquired if he for a moment believed that what she had witnessed had any material existence ?

" I do not say that," was the answer, " but there is this singular coincidence in the matter, that your description of the man's person agrees precisely what that of an old gentleman living—or, rather, who did live—a few doors from hence. He was missing all yesterday, and was found dead in a piece of ground prepared for building, late last night, with every appearance of having been murdered. His age, dress, his very spectacles, were exactly as you describe."

An example of a similar kind happened two years since in Dumfries-shire. A man employed in the quarries was walking home late, by moonlight. Suddenly he came upon two objects lying on the road, which resolved themselves, as he approached, into the bodies of his brother and nephew, workmen in the same quarry, with whom he parted, still at their work, half an hour before. Stooping to touch them, they faded into the white dust on which they seemed to lie! In alarm and amazement, he hastened back to the quarry. An accident had occurred a few minutes after he had left, which cost several lives. Among the victims were his brother and his nephew.

Nothing would be easier than to fill fifty pages with similar examples. These, however, will suffice to illustrate the theoretical principle on which we base the presumption of possibility. Of the differing modes of operation it is in vain to speak. One thing only seems clear, that it is not always, as in the case last quoted, a mere reproduction of the dying or deceased image, but is endowed with the power of presenting the appearance of action and vitality, and imparting impressions entirely foreign to such as would naturally arise from a contemplation of the scene actually passing.

The story of the Tyrone ghost—as famous in its day as that of Lord Lyttelton—would, if authenticated, have been only second in value to the less renowned—equally apocryphal—legend inserted in the parish register of Gately, Norfolk, in the handwriting of the Rev. Robert Withers, then (1706) vicar of the parish, relating how that, while Mr. Shaw, " an ingenious good man, formerly Fellow of St. John's, Cambridge sat smoking, reading," (it may be surmised dozing) " comes in o' the sudden—likewise of St. John's—who hath been dead this four years."

The little embarrassment arising from the novelty of the position having been got over, the two gentlemen chatted together very comfortably for two hours, the only drawback being the somewhat unsatisfactory account given by the visitor as to the condition of certain old associates who had, it was hoped, passed into a land of rest. Whether worthy Mr. Shaw offered his friend a pipe, or other refreshment, is not stated ; but, " as he was going away, he asked him to stay a little longer. He refused. And I then inquired if he would be likely to call again ?" (Perhaps a select circle of old Cambridge chums would have been invited to meet him!) " No " was, however, the reply. " He had but three days' leave of absence, and, withal other business ;" about which , it is to be presumed, he went.

We may smile at the readiness with which the good minister attempted to give to what was manifestly a dream, the force of reality. But the Tyrone ghost, above referred to, rests upon a mass of testimony which, could it be brought to harmonize without flaw, could only be dismissed on the plea that it was a cleverly concocted experiment upon public credulity. It has been denied and reasserted times out of mind. Few tales so closely canvassed have been ultimately left in a condition of equal uncertainty. It has been conjectured that members of the Beresford family might be in possession of particulars which, if they failed to elucidate the source of the narrative, might, at least, correct its inaccuracies. But neither hint nor challenge from the curious has produced any such evidence, nor is there special reason for believing that any such is in existence.

It is a little singular that the writer, while engaged on this paper, has received intimation that something of a remarkable nature has transpired with regard to the case in question, having a tendency to corroborate what has been popularly believed. Lest this should prove true, we will recapitulate the story as shortly as possible, omitting minor details.

Lord Tyrone and Lady Anne Beresford were alike left orphans. They were of the same age, and under the care of the same guardian, who was a Deist, and who educated them in principles similar to his own. At the age of fourteen they were separately removed to other care, and efforts were made to indoctrinate them in the truths of revealed religion. These were only partially successful. The minds of the children were perplexed and unhappy, and, in one of their conversations (for their friendship continued as before), a mutual promise was made that which ever should die first should appear to the survivor, and declare what religious faith was most acceptable to the Supreme Judge.

The young lady married Sir Marcus Beresford, with whom after a considerable period of wedded life, she was one day seated at breakfast, when her husband noticed that she looked unusually pale, and, moreover, that she wore round one of her wrists a broad black ribbon. In allusion to the latter, Sir Marcus inquired if any accident had befallen her. She replied that he would never again see her without that ribbon ; but implored him to abstain from all inquiry, then or ever, into the subject. Here for the moment the conversation ended ; but, during breakfast, the servant entering with the post-bag, Lady Beresford became violently agitated, and exclaimed :

" It is as I expected. He is dead "

" Who is dead ?" asked Sir Marcus, in surprise.

"Lord Tyrone. He died on Tuesday, at four o'clock"

The bag was found to contain a letter from Lord Tyron's steward, reporting his master's death at the time stated.

A few months after this event, Lady Beresford, who had already two daughters, presented her husband with a son. When this boy was four years old, his father, Sir Marcus, died, and the widow withdrew into almost complete retirement, visiting no family but that of a clergyman, who, with his wife and son, resided in the same village. To this son, many years her junior, Lady Beresford, much to the amazement of her friends, was married.

By this union she had two more daughters, but her husband proved a reckless and abandoned libertine, and they lived for some years seperate, until his expressions of contrition led to a renewal of intercourse, and she subsequently became the mother of a fifth daughter.

It was about a month after this confinement that she is said to have summoned to her chamber a very dear friend, Lady B. C., and also her son by Sir Marcus Beresford (then a lad of twelve), and narrated the following particulars :

After admitting the compact between herself and Lord Tyrone, before alluded to, she stated that being one night awakened, she saw his lordship seated by the bed. She screamed aloud, and strove in vain to arouse her husband. A long conversation succeeded, in which Lord Tyron informed her that he had died on Tuesday, at four o'clock, and had been permitted to reveal himself in this manner, and assure her that the revealed religion was alone acceptable to the Almighty. He foretold the birth of her son (the lad then present), and that son's marriage with his, Lord Tyron's, daughter ; the death of Sir Marcus ; and her own marriage with her present husband, by whom she would have two daughters and a son. He also told her she would die—after her confinement with the latter—in the forty-seventh year of her age.

All this, as they knew, had come to pass, but, up to the present day, she had concealed the prophecy of her death because, from a miscalculation, she had believed herself now in her forty-eighth year, and, consequently, past the time of peril. This error, which she had only discovered the previous day, convinced her that her end was near.

Reverting to the spectral visit, she proceeded to say that, having doubts whether she was not wandering or asleep, she sought from the apparition some proof of his actual presence, upon which, at a wave of his hand, the crimson velvet curtains passed themselves through a large iron hoop which formed the canopy of the bed. He further wrote some words in her pocket-book, and, finding her still dissatisfied, touched (with her consent, and after a warning) her wrist. The sinews instantly shrunk up, the nerves seemed to wither, yet not so as to disable the hand. Cautioning her never to display this indelable token of his visit, Lord Tyrone disappeared.

"When I am dead," she concluded, "as the necessity for concealment ends with my life, I wish that you, my friend, should remove the ribbon, and permit my son to see what it has hidden.

With the utmost composure she made preparation for death which ensued the same afternoon.

Her friend then unbound the ribbon, when the wrist was found to present appearances precisely such as might be expected from the narrative related by the deceased lady. The black ribbon and the pocket-book remained (in 1802) still in possession of her friend, believed it may be now mentioned, to be the Lady Botty Cobbe. Lady Beresford's son married, as had been predicted, the daughter of Lord Tyron.

Such is the outline of this remarkable story, a clear analysis of which, with comparison of dates and of facts asserted, with those actually ascertained, is beyond the limits of this paper. " Credimus, quia incredibile est " ("We believe, because it is credible"), is a hard saying to the many. It is only when we consent to gaze beyond the limited field of human knowledge and practical demonstration, that the incredible may be comprehended, the impossible overcome.—All the Year Round.

[Note by Charles Dickens.—Without presumptuously denying the possibility suggested by the esteemed writer of this paper, it is to be observed of such a story as Lady Beresford that the alleged facts need to be very distinctly agreed upon. Lady Beresford's story may be called one of the leading cases. In the version of it which is the best known to us, Lady Beresford demands of the Spirit some assurance of the reality of its appearance. The Spirit then causes the large curtain at the foot of the bed to pass over the high tester, and asks is she satisfied now ? She objects that although she could not climb up and do that, waking, still, for aught she knows, she may be able to do it, sleeping, and therefore she is not satisfied. The Spirit then writes in her pocket-book which lies on a table at the bedside, and asks her, is she satisfied now ? She objects that although she could not counterfeit that hand, waking, still, for aught she knows, she may be able to do it, sleeping, and therefore she is not satisfied. Then comes the touch upon the wrist and its shrivelling up. We offered the suggestion, some years ago, that this is very expressive of a state of sleep-walker or half-consciousness, in which Lady Beresford either actually did those two acts, or debated with herself the possibility of doing them ; she being, either way, in an exceptional condition presently culminating in a stroke of local paralysis Or, the whole may have been a diseased impression accompanying the paralysis ; as most of us have dreamed a long story clearly originating in its own catastrophe—some disturbing sound.

Of the broad margin of allowance that must always be left for coincidence in these cases, we had personal experience not very long ago. We dreamed that we were in a large assembly, and saw a lady in a bright red wrapper, whom we thought we knew. Her back being toward us, we touched her. On her looking round, she disclosed a face that was unknown to us, and, on our apologising, said, pleasantly : " I am Miss N——," mentioning a name, not the name of any friend or acquaintance we had, although a well-known name. The dream was usually vivid, and we awoke. On the very next evening, we recognised (with a strange feeling) coming in at the open door of our room, the lady of the dream, in the bright red wrapper. More extraordinary still, the lady was presented by the friend who accompanied, her, as Miss N——, the name in the dream. No circumstance near or remote, that we could ever trace, in the least accounted for this. The lady came on the real common-place visit, in pursuance of an appointment quite unexpectedly made with the lady who introduced her, only on the night of the dream. From the latter we had no previous knowledge of her name, nor of her existence.]

The Women of Paris.—A stranger who enters any place at first receives impressions vivid enough in their kind, but which may nevertheless need correction after the lapse of time, and the occurrence of fuller opportunities of knowledge. But the original ideas remain and are difficult to uproot, and they are always, to a certain extent, interesting.

On entering Paris for the first time, a crowd of new ideas are presented to the mind. First of all come the bright aspect of the streets, the brilliant coloring of houses and shops, of sky and trees, the general impression that the object of life is the pursuit of pleasure, and that the inhabitants of Paris are successfully engaged in following out this aim.

After that, we have the people, the common people particularly ; for, thanks to the fashions which Paris sets, and all the world follows, the women of the middle and upper classes dress much as those of correspouding ranks do in the United States. Perhaps among these latter, the modes, which in the United States we regard as solely those of the fashion books, are more commonly the kinds of attire worn. Short dresses are very prevalent ; but the bonnets are not so much of the " plate" and " dish" orders of architecture as among ourselves. We have seen very few French women without some kind of crinoline, and none at all who, in walking, allow their dresses to drag along through the mud and dust.

New French Fashions.—Paris has a new idea. A letter from that city says : " It is fashionable to deck horses and coachmen with flowers. Some adopt violets, and as they drive by quite perfume the air. Others prefer white roses. There may be no harm in flowers on horses' ears than ribbons. For my part, I do not think a horse is particular which way his head is got up ; but I see sad times coming ; for this love of decoration is such that from the coach, which is one sheet of crests and armorial bearings, up to the drawing-room, everything is overdone.

" Damask, velvet and carpet are no longer purchased by brides for solidity and comfort, but for nothing but show. Some of the most torturing chairs are the most expensive. Sofas are made of white or pale yellow satin ; footstools of painted velvet. An easy chair is all down and brocade. Little pug dogs sleep, snore and follow the dictates of canine nature in flesh-colored cushions. Hangings are as costly as paintings. Violet satin, worked with gold, is the fashionable material for a drawing room, with furniture of black rosewood. Jonquil satin and blue, with inlaid furniture, are used for the boudoir ; green velvet and oak for dining-rooms, which are now wainscotted with shelves and covered with unique china, enamel plates and costly ware."

LITERARY GLEANINGS.

THE DARWINIAN THEORY.

The last number of the North British Review, contains a remarkably able and elaborate article on the "development theory." The writer contends that, admitting the facts adduced by Mr. Darwin in support of this theory to be correct, they by no means warrant the inferences that have been deduced from them. This is the point of view from which the discussion is conducted, reversing the process of Mr. Darwin's usual opponents, who deny his facts, instead of calling in question his reasoning. The first argument is drawn from the necessary limits of the principle of natural selection in producing varieties. It is said that if man can produce certain differences among animals in a limited space of time, there is no bound to the possible differences in a countless series of ages. That is, if six or seven years selection in breeding can make a pouter out of a common pigeon, several myriads of years can change a pigeon to something like a thrush. But this is like saying that because a cannon-ball has traversed a mile in a minute, therefore in an hour it will be sixty miles off and in the course of ages will reach the fixed stars. The truth is whatever new point in the variable beast, bird, or flower, be chosen as desirable by a fancier, this point can be rapidly approached at first, but the rate of approach quickly diminishes, tending to a limit never to be attained. Great as the variability is, we have no proof that successive variations of the same kind can be accumulated. Nor, secondly, does it follow, because certain individuals of an animal species may become better adapted than others to the circumstances in which they are placed, and thus gain a better chance of life, that a whole species will gradually acquire some one new quality, or wholly change in one direction, and in the same manner. For instance, half the hares which are born may be presumed to be more like rabbits in their burrowing organs than the primitive ancestral hare was; but this peculiarity cannot be improved by natural selection until a considerable number of hares begin to burrow, of which as yet there has been no likelihood of their doing. In other words, admitting that natural selection may improve organs already useful to great numbers of a species, we have no right to conclude that it can create or develope new organs, and so originate species. But the argument which the writer brings to bear on Darwin's hypothesis is taken from the "lapse of time" which is necessary, on the hypothesis, for the developement of a species. The most accurate methods of computation show that the world cannot have been habitable for more than an infinitely insufficient period for the execution of the Darwinian transmutation. In illustration of this, the doctrine of conversation of force is turned to account in a novel and ingenious manner. As the total amount of energy in the universe is constant, whether latent or in action, undergoing not a change in amount, but a change of distribution, so there is a continual dissipation of energy by which the available power to produce change in any finite quantity of matter diminishes at every change of the distribution of energy. Every change in the distribution of energy depends on a difference between bodies, and any change, tends on the whole to diminish this difference, and so render the total future possible change less in amount. No sooner does energy take the form of heat, for example, than it is rapidly dissipated, that is, it is distributed among a large number of bodies which assume a nearly equal temperature, and is thus practically lost. The equivalent of energy is there, but it can produce no change until some fresh body, at a very different temperature, is presented to it. But the sun's rays take the form of heat, whether they raise water or vegetation, or do any other work, and in this form the energy quits the earth radiated into distant space. The material universe thus tends to changing death, and even the rate at which the planetary system is thus dying is perfectly measurable, if not yet perfectly measured. An estimate of the total loss of heat from the sun is an estimate of the rate at which he is approaching the condition of surrounding space, after reaching which he will radiate no more. Admitting that the sun may be supplied with heat and fuel by absorbing certain planetary bodies, still the supply is limited, and the sun will become too cold for Darwin's purposes before many millions of years—a long time, to be sure, but far enough from countless ages. Not any more conceivable are past countless ages; insomuch as the heat required by the sun to have allowed him to cool from time immemorial, would be such as to turn him into mere vapor, which would extend over the whole planetary system, and evaporate us entirely. Still other considerations are brought forward to show that the age of the inhabited world is limited to a period wholly inconsistent with Darwin's views. The sum of the argument may be stated as follows: Experiment has shown a sharp limit to the variations of every species. Natural selection is powerless to perpetuate new organs even should they appear. Countless ages of a habitable globe are proved impossible by the physical laws which forbid the assumption of infinite power in a finite mass. Hence the writer concludes that the theory of Darwin is only an ingenious and plausible speculation, to which future physiologists will look back with the kind of admiration we bestow on the atoms of Lucretius, or the crystal spheres of Eudoxus, containing like these some half faint truths, marking at once the ignorance of the age and the ability of the philosopher. The theory is not only without sufficient proof from evidence, but it proved false by a cumulative proof.

A BRITISH VIEW OF THE AMERICAN DEBT.

The last number of Blackwood contains a thoroughly English article entitled "The American Debt, and the Financial Prospects of the Union," from which we make the following extract:

"A great war always creates more scoundrels than it kills; and it must be said of the American Civil War that the best people connected with it were the native born soldiers and sailors on both sides. Of the mercenary Irish and Germans who fought for the bounty money, and did not care a straw for the principles at issue, we shall speak hereafter. Such a terrific debt was never rolled up with such reckless rapidity and such shameless robbery since the world began. As soon as it was found that no money could be borrowed in Europe for the purposes of the strife, and that European capitalists, chary of American ventures at the best, positively refused to advance a sixpence in support of the contest—neither party to which enlisted much of their sympathy, and the North least of all—the Federal Government saw that there was nothing to be done but to borrow as much as it could of the Northern people, and to issue inconvertable paper-money to supply all possible deficiencies. When the war first broke out, the Northern people and their Government had but little idea of the magnitude of the task they had undertaken. Mr. Lincoln, a modest and timid man, was loath or afraid to call for so many as 75,000 men for the castigation of the rebels; and Mr. Seward, as all the world knows, thought ninety days sufficient time to 'whip the South'—using the vulgar Yankee phrase which both Northern and Southern Americans employ, where an Englishman would say to 'conquer.' General Winfield Scott, who, being a Virginian, better knew the temper of his people than Mr. Lincoln of Illinois, or Mr. Seward of New York, considered that three years, three hundred thousand men, and two hundred and fifty millions of dollars (fifty millions sterling), would be none too much for so great a work, and that even all these might be unavailing if a young, an able, and more especially a fortunate general were not discovered to lead his countrymen to victory. The estimate was considered at the time to be highly extravagant. Experience, however, soon proved its moderation in every element except that of time. The three years stretched into four. The killed, the wounded, and the disabled alone amounted, before all was over, to the full three hundred thousand that General Scott considered ample for victory; and the modest two hundred and fifty millions of dollars ran up in one short year to more than double the sum; and before the war was ended, in the early spring of 1865, had reached the ascertained amount of 3000 millions of dollars, or just twelve times as much as General Scott had anticipated.

Toward the middle of the year 1861, up to which time the Government had not resorted to the expedient of printing inconvertible greenbacks, and when it relied solely upon the produce of loans for carrying on the war, the vultures, who sniff carnage from afar off, and delight in the odor of blood—the knavish contractors and jobbers, who are, unfortunately, to be found in all countries, and who think it no sin to rob a nation, however great may be its distress and peril—were busily engaged in the work of plunder. The Government was greatly in want of steamships for the transport of troops, and it was in the matter of steamships that the first organised villainies of the 'patriots,' who thirsted to grow suddenly rich at the expense of a nation battling for its life, were displayed. The sale to the Government of two steamers, the Cataline and the Kill van Kull, excited, at this time, particular remark. The Cataline, an unseaworthy boat, it appears, with which the insurance offices would have nothing to do except at a very exceptional premium, was purchased of her owners for 18,000 dollars, though not worth 12,000, and transferred to the service of the Government for 10,000 dollars per month, for the conveyance of troops between New York and Annapolis. At the end of two months and a half, after making these handsome earnings, she was accidentally destroyed by fire. As she was not insured against this risk, the Government, that had undertaken to pay 50,000 dollars for her in the event of her destruction or loss by any peril not covered by her insurance, had to provide this handsome sum; and the speculators—leading patriots all of them—went on their way rejoicing, willing, no doubt, to supply the Government with as many more steamships as it might desire, on equally favorable terms. This was but one specimen out of scores, and by no means the worst. The brood of contractors and speculators did not, however, confine themselves to this particular mode of plunder. Army stores, horses, mules, fodder, and firearms, were all in hot request, and all were supplied by greedy patriots, desirous of growing rich by a single operation. Shoes that wore out in a three-days' march were supplied at a price three or four hundred per cent. above the market value of the best article that could be manufactured; thousands of stands of old-fashioned and useless firearms were foisted upon the War office; and spavined old mules, fit for nothing but the knacker, were disposed of at princely prices. So great was the scandal created—for naturally every needy scoundrel who could not get his finger into this beautiful pie was indignant at, as well as envious of, those who did, and made a great clamor, through the press and otherwise, about the manner in which the country was robbed—that Congress was alarmed. The result was, that in the summer of 1861 a special committee of seven of the members of the House of Representatives was appointed, under the presidency of Mr. Van Wyck of New York, to 'inquire into all the facts and circumstances connected with contracts and agreements by or with the Government, growing out of its efforts in suppressing the Rebellion.' On the 17th of December the committee presented its report, in which they stated that, instead of summoning witnesses from all parts of the country to Washington, they had deemed it to be their duty to take upon themselves the task of visiting the various localities where it was supposed that examinations would be necessary. They had held sittings, and examined witnesses, in Washington, New York, Boston, New Bedford, St. Louis, Cairo, Chicago, and Harrisburg, and in all travelled between six thousand and seven thousand miles. They examined no less than two hundred and sixty-five witnesses, whose testimony in the Report covered 1109 closely-printed octavo pages. Disgraceful as the facts were supposed to be before the inquiry was instituted, the Report and evidence proved that for once Rumour had been less of a liar than usual, and that she had under rather than over-stated the swindling, peculation; the fraud, and the robbery perpetrated upon the Government. It was not merely the sellers of ships, of stores, of guns, and all such as had anything to dispose of at as high a price as they could get, but the confidential agents of the Government itself, who scented the plunder with keen olfactories, and grabbed it without remorse.

THE ATHENÆUM ON LONGFELLOW.

In concluding a long review of the second volume of the American version of the Divina Commedia, the Athenæum says: "We know of no translation in English in which the beautiful and profound thoughts of Dante in his Purgatorio are rendered with a more conscientious, loving regard, and laudable desire to do him honor, than in this very literal version of Professor Longfellow, which will remain a standard of comparison among English readers, and will be of advantage also to those who are equally familiar with both languages, for here is the production of a master in each."

The Province of Newspapers.—It is unreasonable to expect that the public press will always publish only such things as we, individually, like. A person of strictly religious habits and tastes will be offended if he sees in a newspaper the account of a prize fight, or of something loose and sinful. He forgets that the newspaper is but the reflection of the world at large; and if he is so fastidious he should retire altogether from life, for in a single street he will find, at any given hour of the day, what will offend almost all his senses. He need not read what he considers to be objectionable; in like manner he need not eat at a table de hote any highly-seasoned dish. He may not like venison and game high. Let him order something to his taste—a veal cutlet without sauce. But my dear Miss Mincing may like a few of the in-delicacies of the season, and the Hon. Mr. Wideawake may have a stomach for anything.

A newspaper would have few readers were its dishes of news to consist solely of pious passages and flimsy puffs. While the tone of a newspaper is moral, the public cannot complain. The music of an organ may be of the purest character, though the organ itself, and the organ-grinder, likewise, may sometimes show symptoms of the mud and filth that are picked up by or scattered upon them throughout the ramblings of the day. To the pure all things are pure, and to find fault with a newspaper for every "nice offence" is to display the hypocrisy of a prude, or the silliness of an ignoramus.

New countries have wants and habits peculiar to themselves. In our widely extended and sparsely settled territory, medicines ready prepared are more employed, and are in fact a greater necessity than in the old countries. Dr. Ayer's preparations have given the public greater confidence in the class of remedies than had ever been felt before. Physicians, instead of discarding them, really favor the use of such ready at-hand antidotes for disease, when they can be depended on. And we wish our readers to know that in publishing J. C. Ayer & Co's., advertisement, or any others of like reliable character, we think we are furnishing them as useful information as any with which we can fill our columns.—Louisville Courier.

California Powder Works.—These works are located at Santa Cruz, and have supplied the whole Pacific Coast with a superior article of blasting, sporting and cannon powder since their erection, and such has been the demand on their resources from time to time, that additional machinery and buildings were found necessary to supply the increasing demand. The California Powder Works were the first to reduce the price for Blasting Powder to $3 per keg. The importation of Eastern manufactured blasting powder has almost entirely fallen off in consequence. We have now not only a superior article of powder, but a cheaper one as the result. Mr. John F. Lohse is the Secretary, office No. 318 California street.

A Little More Cider.—John H. Fordam & Co., successors to James Mears, No. 511 Front street, have the largest bottling establishment in San Francisco, where they sell the best of Champagne Cider by the case or in bulk. They also job Ale, Porter and Cider to the City Trade, and fill country orders, at prices that defy competition. The facilities enjoyed by Messrs. J. H. Fordam & Co., give them an especial advantage over others in their line of business.

Commission Broker.—Mr. M. G. Howard has established himself as Commission Broker in the building No. 436 California street, formerly occupied by the Pacific Insurance Company, opposite the new Merchants' Exchange. Mr. Howard buys and sells stock of every description, and stands high in the community and among the fellow brokers as an energetic and thorough business man.

Geo. S. Dickey, apothecary and chemist, corners of Market, Ellis, and Stockton streets, has an original compound entitled Creme de Lis de Californie, for cleaning and preserving the teeth and beautifying the complection and removing freckles, eruptions, etc., which is really a very valuable accessory to every lady's toilet table. It is pronounced better than any imported article—try it and be satisfied of that point.

Murphy, Grant & Co.—This old established and leading dry goods house invites the attention of buyers, in our advertising columns, to their large and well-assorted stock of new dry goods which they are now offering at greatly reduced rates to the Fall trade.

New Carpets.—Joseph Fredericks, No. 122 Kearny street between Sutter and Post, has just received an invoice of some very choice and new style carpets—something rich durable and cheap—that are worthy the attention of all parties contemplating purchasing.

Fall Hats.—The new styles are out. Meussdorffer, the leader of the fashion in the Hat line, announces in our columns that his Fall and Winter dress hats are now ready. See advertisement.

FIVE YEARS IN JAPAN.

BY FORBES MAITLAND.

No. IV.

AT a small village called Kamakura is a very fine temple of the Buddhist persuasion. Here is also a magnificent image, called "Die bootz." It is made of bronze. The figure is in a sitting posture, and is over thirty feet high. It was near this place that Major Baldwin and Lieut. Bird were so cruelly murdered, two years ago. Lieut. Bird was cut down while in the act of sketching the temple. I must, however, do the Japanese government the credit, and say that on this occasion the guilty party was brought to punishment, in what, for the Japanese, was a very expeditious manner. The culprit was caught and executed about three months after the assassination was committed, and the foreign community had the pleasure of seeing the wretch beheaded. I shall not soon forget the evening he was brought into Yokohama, and taken, bound on horseback, with the crime he had been guilty of, written in large characters on his back; one would not have supposed, however, from the manner in which he was talking and joking with the guard, that in one hour he would be beheaded; few, if any Europeans could have met death more calmly, and with greater bravery than he did. I am sure there was not a man present who did not admire the manner in which he replied to the officer when asked if he would be blindfolded, "No; I will at least show those barbarians that a Japanese can die like a man." There can be no doubt but that blind belief and trust which the Japanese place in their priests must be a great comfort to a man at the point of death—just to say to oneself "My priest tells me I am all right, so I need have no fear."

The Japanese Buddhists do not believe that the images are of any good whatever, only in the case of ignorant people, who must have some visible object to pray to. They believe, however, that the Mekado (spiritual Emperor) has full power, that he can do anything just by saying the word. At the time the allied fleet went down to Shemonasaki to open the Inland Sea, a well educated Japanese informed me in all seriousness, that it would be of no use, as the Mekado could by a single movement, if he felt so inclined, raise up a storm and destroy the whole fleet. When the fleet returned to Yokohama, after having destroyed all the forts, I called to see my friend; the fellow seemed awfully disgusted, but was of the opinion that the Mekado was angry with Matsdare Nagata no Kami, (the Prince of Nagata,) and therefor would not assist him. I could not convince him that it was the want of power, and not the want of the will. The Japanese government are extremely jealous of any encroachments on the national religion by foreigners; thus, no Japanese are allowed on any pretence whatever to enter an European place of worship. Some four years ago, a French chapel was built in Yokohama, and some Japanese from the country, seeing the door open, and not knowing what the place was, curiosity led them to enter; on coming out they were immediately seized, bound and lugged off to the Custom House, to answer for the grievious offence they had committed, and I have no doubt were made to pay pretty dearly for the glimpse they had obtained of a European "Joss House."

A few years ago, I, in company with a few friends, went for a few days shooting to the small villiage of Aranca, or as we called it "Abraham's bosom," on account of the snug little harbor which is there. It is about sixty miles from Yokohama, and consequently beyond the treaty limits, but as it was quite a common resort, we did not think there would be any trouble. The priest and one or two other parties were extremely kind to us, providing us with eggs, fowls, and in fact, with anything they had. About a week after I heard that all the people who had sold us anything, including the good old priest, had been arrested and sent to Yeddo for not sending word to Yokohama that we were there. The Japanese have a particular dislike to shooting parties, and I think since they have such a prejudice, that foreigners ought to respect it, and not as some whom I could name have done, prowling all over the country in search of game, not even respecting ground which is considered by the Japanese as sacred. I cannot see that an European has any more right to interfere with the religious belief of a Japanese, than a Japanese interfering with theirs. It may in our eyes appear absurd, still it is their belief and let them stick to it. There is a law in existance in Japan that no one shall shoot game of any description within thirty miles of Yeddo, still, foreigners will not respect this law, and persist in going on shooting excursions in the direction of Yeddo in preferance, I believe, for the simple reason that it is forbidden.

It is dangerious to shoot certain animals in Japan, as one may unintentionally commit the crime of murder—that is in the eyes of the Japanese.

The Japanese believe in the doctrine of the transmigration of souls, in connection with a system of progression. Their belief is, that if a man, during his life-time, is honest and good, his soul will, after his death, take possession of a more glorious body. Thus, in course of ages, the soul of a Coolie may pass through many bodies until at length it finds itself in that of a Damio. On the other hand, should the soul, during its progress, be polluted by the sin of one of the bodies which it inhabits, it may be cast down from its high estate and find itself a dog, a horse, or as low as a fox. Under these circumstances the Japanese are extremely kind to animals. No man would run the risk of kicking a dog, lest he might unwittingly be committing an assault on his departed grandmother, who, in consequence of some serious faux pas, had been condemned to assume that form after death. How horrified a Japanese of strict religious principles would be to see dogs which might or might not be his near relations, running about with muzzles on, under penalty of being slaughtered by the poundmaster. After a man—or rather his soul—has "gone to the dogs" in Japan, he has an opportunity of redeeming himself; as careless men become dogs, so do good, circumspect, well-behaved dogs become men, and it is quite possible that the soul of many a proud Damio who now walks about clad in gorgeous apparel, may have, ages ago, occupied the body of a small pug-nosed poodle.

There is a peculiar ceremony occasionally practised in Japan, namely, ripping open the abdomen, thus committing the much-talked-of "Hara Keeri," or, as it is commonly written "Hari Kari." In days gone by the translation of this was given as "Happy dispatch." This is wrong—the literal translation of the words, is "belly cut." By performing this act the property is saved from confiscation, in event of the party having incurred the displeasure of the government, by having evinced cowardice, or even drawn his sword without killing his man. It is considered the only gentlemanly manner of voluntarily leaving this world of sin and sorrow. A rather amusing case came under my notice a few weeks ago; one of the Japanese in the Eastern States committed suicide by hanging; the first telegram, however, stated he had committed "Hara Keeri." On informing the Japanise here that he had done so, they did not seem at all to regret the death of their countryman—they merely remarked, in the most quiet and unconcerned manner, "Ah! yes, that is the way a Japanese officer dies, if he is tired of the world." But a decided change came "over the spirit of their dreams," when I informed them he had merely hanged himself like any common barbarian. That was indeed, horrible, then they mourned most heartily the death of their unfortunate countryman, who they evidently thought had made a most arrant fool of himself, and very considerably disgraced his country. Many people believe that committing "Hara Keeri" is quite an every day occurrance, but I can assure them that such is not the case. A Japanese must have some very good reason for quitting this life before he will have recourse to the last remedy. During my residence in Japan, I did certainly hear of several cases, two of which I had actual proof of. I think it would be about safe to put down one half of the reported "Hara Keerites" as at least doubtful.

In my next I will further pursue this subject of the religious belief of the Japanese, and give some account of the Sshto religion, of which nothing has, to my knowledge, been written.

DRAMATIC AFFAIRS.

IT is better—or at least quite as well to be born lucky as rich. Mr. and Mrs. Bates have, I know, met with good luck in other portions of the United States, but here they have met with nothing but bad luck. In the first place they arrived when Edwin Adams had just commenced his engagement, and were consequently forced to remain idle for eight weeks; then Mr. Bates did not come up to the standard of excellence established by the public of this city after ten weeks of Edwin Adams. Everyone who witnessed Mrs. Bates' impersonation of "Camille" confessed that it was charming—the best, in fact, ever witnessed in this city. Still the house was not crowded. Political excitement was at its height, and had Ristori appeared she might have failed in drawing large houses. On Monday, the performance, at Maguire's Opera House, consisted of East Lynne; in the character of "Lady Isabel" Mrs. Bates was rather lacking in the dignity befitting an "Earl's daughter," and her pronounciation of many words of the Queen's English was sadly incorrect; in the part of "Madame Vine" she was just a little too lackrymose. Mr. Graves, the industrious and energetic manager of Maguire's Opera House, was the recipient of a benefit on the evening of Tuesday—the day before the election. If Mr Graves had any choice afforded him he displayed a most plentiful lack of "management" in chosing such a night. I am afraid that, in spite of all the actors and actresses volunteering their services, he realized but a small sum. Shylock was played most abominably throughout. Mr. McCullough performed the title-role in a terribly hard deliberate manner, and was listened to and gazed at by a stolid audience, which expressed no signs of disapprobation. Mrs. Bates, as "Portia," was too slow in the second act, but redeemed herself in the trial scene, reading the speech excellently well.

> "The quality of mercy is not strained, etc."

After the tragedy was disposed of, Jake Wallace played a banjo solo and sang two songs; the gallery would have had Jake continue to play the banjo for half an hour, had he not begged their forebearance, urging the plea of sickness, and declined his third encore. In the farce of Belle of the Kitchen, which concluded the entertainment. Miss Olivia Rand pleased everyone by the clever manner in which she impersonated "Penelope." She sang the eccentric ballad of "Con-stan-ti-no-ple" capitally, and her imitations of Signor Abecco's style of singing "When this Cruel War is Over" caused roars of laughter and applause. Miss Rand has talent which, if cultivated judiciously and assiduously, will, in time, raise her to a high rank in her profession. She professes the finest natural contralto voice that was, perhaps, ever heard on the San Francisco stage, but it much needs the aid of the art before it can be rendered available for any more ambitious a line of business than comic singing. In this farce Willie Edouin as "Pitcher," and W. Barry as "Tosser" caused roars of laughter. The favor which this very slight affair met with should serve as a limit to the management to produce a farce occasionally as an offset to a heavy piece. On Wednesday, The Barrack Room and The Belle of the Kitchen were played. On Thursday, the performance consisted of Boucicault's capital comedy of London Assurance. Mrs. Bates made a capital "Lady Gay Spanker" playing especially well in the last act where the part called for a display of feeling. Mr. Edwards played too "fine" a "Sir Horcourt Courtley" to gain many a laugh. He failed to bring out the points of the character in sufficiently bold relief to make them evident to the audience. Miss Sallie Hinckley deserves much praise for the excellent manner in which she read and acted the part of "Grace Harkaway," and the applause with which she was greeted, proved that the public of San Francisco is always ready to appreciate the efforts of an actress who evinces talent and industry. Few of our "home-made" actresses have made such rapid progress in their profession as has Miss Sallie Hinckley, during the last year, and the success which she has achieved has been gained by assiduous study. John McCullough's "Dazzle" was a well-maintained performance. Mr. Anderson, in the part of "Max Harkaway" gave as good a representation of the old English Squire "Max Harkaway" and sympathized with "Lady Gay Spanker's" enthusiastic love of hunting as fully as if "to the manner born." Willie Edouin acted "Dolly Spanker" capitally, avoiding exaggeration of the character, and W. Barry was very amusing in the part of "Meddle." On Friday night, Leah the Forsaken was performed.

The entertainment at the matinee to-day, will consist of The Barrack Room and the roaring farce of The Belle of the Kitchen. This evening, Mrs. Bates, who has had so little chance afforded her to make enough money to remunerate her for the annoyance of a long sea voyage, but who has nevertheless gained the admiration of all who have witnessed her performances, will take a benefit. Californians have never hitherto allowed an actor or actress of merit to visit these shores without giving him or her a substantial acknowledgment. Mrs. Bates is a really talented actress, and richly deserves such a testimonial of esteem at the hands of our liberal and discriminating public.

On Monday, Dan Bryant, the celebrated Irish comedian, will make his first appearance before a California audience, He will open his engagement at Maguire's Opera House in the plays of Handy Andy and The Irish Emigrant.

At the Metropolitan Theatre True to the Core has made a most decided hit. The fine scenic effects, beautiful tableaux, and patriotic sentiments of this drama combine to render it a favorite with all classes. Henri Herberte plays "Clovely Jack" capitally, and sings "Nil Desperandum" in a style which never fails to bring down the house, and ensure an encore, Harry Jackson's "Merrywheather" is a clever bit of acting, and causes much laughter. After next week this piece must be withdrawn to make way for the grand spectacular and musical drama entitled Azael the Prodigal, by Scribe, introducing Auber's beautiful music. This piece will be produced with new and gorgeous scenery, a full corps de ballet, and an immense cast, on Monday, September 16th.

WOODWARD'S GARDENS.—The collection of curious animals at these Gardens is now very large, and extensive preparations are now being made for the reception of many more, which are now on their way from Europe, where they were purchased by Mr. Woodward. The tropical bowers present a very beautiful appearance at present. Cosy little picnic parties visit these delightful gardens daily, and enjoy their meal under the spreading oaks. Through the liberality of the proprietor, on two days of each week, schools, accompanied by their teachers, are admitted free of charge.

CITY GARDENS.—These Gardens are becoming a very popular resort. A fine instrumental concert is given every Saturday afternoon, and on Sunday a sacred concert takes place. The croquet ground attracts many players and lookers on at this graceful game, which has become quite a favorite with the ladies. Additions are being constantly made to the zoological collection, and the green-houses are full of beautiful flowers. The serpentine walks furnish a delightfully cool and shady retreat, and are the scene of much billing and cooing between the youth of both sexes.

TOUCHSTONE.

TOO LATE.

FAR off in the dim and desolate Past—
That shoreless and sorrowful sea
Where wrecks are driven by the wave and blast,
Shattered, sunken, and lost at last,
Lies the heart that was broken for me—
Poor heart!
Long ago broken for me!

My loves were Glory and Pride and Art—
Ah, dangerous rivals three!
Sweet lips might quiver and warm tears start
Should an artist pause for a woman's heart—
Even that which was broken for me!
Poor heart!
Too rare to be broken for me!

Oh, she was more mild than the summer wind,
More fair than the lilies be!
More true than the star with twilight twined,
Was the spirit against whose love I sinned—
The heart that was broken for me—
Poor heart!
Cruelly broken for me!

I told her an artist should wed his art—
That only his love should be;
No other should lure me from mine apart,
I said; and my cold words chilled her heart,
The heart that was broken for me—
Poor heart!
Hopelessly broken for me!

I spoke of the beautiful years to come,
In the lands beyond the sea!
Those years which must be so wearisome
To her; but patient lips were dumb;
In silence it broke for me!
Poor heart!
Broke, yet complained not, for me!

I pressed her hand, and rebuked her tears
Lightly and carelessly;
I said my triumphs should reach her ears,
And left alone with dismal years
And the heart that was breaking for me—
Poor heart!
Silently breaking for me!

My days were a dream of summer time
My life was a victory;
Fame wove bright garlands to crown my prime,
And I half forgot in that radiant clime,
The heart that was broken for me—
Poor heart!
Patiently breaking for me!

But my whole life seemed, as the swift years rolled,
More hollow and vain to be;
Fame's bosom at best is hard and cold—
O, I would have given all praise and gold
For the heart that was broken for me—
Poor heart!
Thanklessly broken for me!

Sick with longing, with hope and dread
I hurried across the sea;
She had wasted as though with grief, they said—
Poor child, poor child!—and was long since dead;
Ah, dead for the love of me—
Poor heart!
Broken, and vainly, for me!

Weighed down by a load too heavy to hold,
She died unmurmuringly;
And I, remorseful and unconsoled,
I dream of the wasted days of old,
And of the heart that was broken for me—
Poor heart!
Broken so vainly for me!

And my soul cried out in bitter pain
For the bliss that cannot be—
For the love that never can come again;
For the sweet young life that was lived in vain,
And the heart that was broken for me—
Poor heart!
Broken and buried for me!

THE LIFE AND ADVENTURES OF BARNEY McBRIAR, THE SHOOTIST.

A NOVEL.

BY PRENTICE MULFORD.

BARNEY McBRIAR was the hero and the terror of Mad Mule Flat.

He was by profession a shootist, twenty-one years of age.

His sole stock in trade consisted of two navy revolvers, a couple of derringers, and a bowie knife. These articles never left his person.

He sustained life, mainly, by swallowing daily an indefinite number of "whisky straights," for which no barkeeper ever thought of demanding pay.

He ruled Mad Mule Flat with a rod of iron. His four pistol barrels were four literal, ruling rods of iron.

His body was adorned with comely raiment, he lodged and fed sumptuously; his linen was of the purest and whitest; yet like unto the wild lilies of the valley, he neither toiled nor spun.

The Israelitish clothing-dealers groaned heavily in spirit when Barney McBriar entered his establishment and ordered of him a suit, yet he ventured no remonstrance.

Why? Because it is unhealthy to irritate a shootist.

Barney McBriar was a shootist.

CHAPTER II.

At the tender age of nine years, Barney McBriar's schoolmarm one day boxed his ears.

Whereupon, little Barney whipped out a bowie knife, the present of a Texan uncle (whose last advice was never to take a blow from any man), and with it he explored the digestive organs of his female preceptress.

The schoolmarm was ever afterwards afflicted with chronic dyspepsia, the effect of this cutting reproof.

After this occurrence, the Board of Education at Mad Mule Flat were unable to procure any more schoolmarms.

So, little Barney's education was for a time neglected, although he managed to keep himself in practice by playfully shooting two of his little brothers, who were thereby maimed for life.

Peleg Haddam kept school at Bull Tail Gulch.

The interesting little Barney was sent to Mr. Haddam's seminary.

When Mr. Haddam heard that he was to be patronized by the youthful McBriar, he made his will and had his life insured.

"The wise man foreseeth evil and hideth himself, but the simple pass on and are punished."

Peleg Haddam next provided himself with a double-barrelled shot gun.

"In time of peace prepare for war."

The juvenile McBriar heard of the Military preparations of his future preceptor with coolness, merely remarking, "I'll get him yet."

CHAPTER III.

It was a bright May morning in June.

Peleg Haddam was running his school under a full head of steam.

Suddenly he detected the sanguinary McBriar reading the "Life of Sixteen Stringed Jack."

"Give me that book, you sir," said Peleg Haddam to Barney McBriar,

"I won't."

Peleg snatched the saffron-colored volume from his grasp.

In an instant, little Barney jerked out his six-shooter and blew off Mr. Haddam's head! The school, being without a head, immediately broke up.

Haddam was interred along with the schoolmarm, and the unfortunate pedantic couple formed a nucleus for Barney McBriar's cemetery.

Public opinion was principally on the side of the gallant McBriar.

He became an object of interest and sympathy, and henceforth was no longer regarded by his elders as a child.

The Board of Education experienced a great difficulty in getting another target for Barney, as Bull Tail Flat was avoided by all peripatetic pedagogues.

At length a discharged convict strayed into camp, and, unaware of the risk he ran, was induced to take the school for thirty-five dollars a month and "board around."

CHAPTER IV.

The discharged convict preceptor, complaining one morning that he was obliged to sleep, while boarding in a Dutch family, along with four of his pupils, B. McBriar, who allowed no one to abuse the inhabitants of the Flat save himself, "coolly blew the top of the convicts head off."

He then gave himself up to the authorities.

Forty-six of the leading and influential citizens of the county at once offered to give bail for Barney McBriar.

The day of trial came.

The Court, after sentencing Gin Hop, a Chinaman, to two years imprisonment at San Quentin, for stealing a pair of boots, called the case of the People vs. McBriar.

McBriar marched proudly into the court room.

The trial lasted four hours.

Forty or fifty witnesses testified favorably as to the moral character of the defendant.

The Jury were out five minutes, and returned a verdict of "Not Guilty."

The Court then adjourned, and everybody got drunk.

Many young men reckoned that night as the proudest period of their existence, when they were fortunate enough to be introduced to McBriar and take him by the hand.

He was the lion of the day, and after killing a couple of strangers that night, left the next morning, attended by a large concourse of friends.

CHAPTER V.

Six years had elapsed.

Barney McBriar and his friend McShoot were seated, smoking, on the piazza of the Magnolia Hotel.

Barney was regarding, with an observant eye, his cemetery on the hill side, which had increased considerably in size, and was laid out in a neat and tasteful manner.

Occasionally a citizen of the Flat, minus an arm, a nose, an ear, or a leg, limped past, the limping evidence of Barney's pistolary skill.

Barney had been reading Malthus on Population that morning, and he felt that something should be done to prevent the frightful increase of the human race.

Moreover, he had killed no one for three days.

His conscience troubled him.

"There's one grave needed to make the number even on the left hand row of the third plat of my cemetery," said McBriar.

"You mean the stranger's department," said McShoot.

"McBriarwood" was laid out in four separate plats. One for politicians, one for strangers, one for schoolmasters, and one miscellaneous, Chinamen, etc.

At that moment, two well-dressed strangers rode up to the door.

"I say, you, that's my horse," roared McBriar to one of the strangers. "I lost him two years ago. He has my brand on the off shoulder."

"Why, My Dear Sir, I bought——

"You lie," cried McBriar, rushing forward, pistol in hand, and seizing the animal by the bridle.

The stranger made a motion with his hand, as if to draw a weapon, when McBriar, without a moment's hesitation, "blew the top of his head off," and McShoot, who, during this altercation had carefully kept the stranger covered, also "blew the top of his head off."

"Hang it, we're no better off now than before," said McBriar.

"How so?" said McShoot.

"There were six graves on one side, and seven on the other, before, while now the number is still uneven, since there will be seven on one side and eight on the other," said McBriar.

During the conversation, the two strangers died in a quiet, unobtrusive manner.

"Never mind. I'll make it all right," said McBriar, and so saying, he leveled his pistol at a traveling book and newspaper agent passing by, and skillfully "blew the top of his head off."

"Here, take these men and bury them," said McBriar, to a passing Chinaman, giving him a dollar.

CHAPTER VI.

McBriar and McShoot gave themselves up to the justice of the peace.

"Justifiable homicide, warn't it?" said the Justice.

"Of course it was," said McBriar. "Why the cusses, both carried concealed weapons."

"Well, I'll let you off this time, but you must be a little more careful, boys," said the magistrate.

"O, you dry up," said McShoot, "or we'll blow the top of your head off."

The magistrate was silent, but the insult was not forgotten.

That night, McBriar and McShoot were seated in the Magnolia, playing poker with two cattle drovers.

In consideration of the fact that McBriar held as many aces as he wanted, and had every longer in the room telegraphing to him, it is not singular that he had already won some two thousand dollars.

Just then a voice was heard at the door, saying "McBriar, come out here a moment."

McBriar stepped to the door, put out his head, and the last vision on which his mortal eyes rested was the outraged Justice of the Peace, behind a large double-barrelled goose gun. The next moment came a stunning report, and McBriar had "the top of his head blown off."

McShoot ran to the assistance of his friend, but he was promptly met by the other barrel, and off went the top of his head also.

Quiet now reigns in Bull Tail Flat.

MESSRS P. Blier's and E. MacDonnell's translation of Mr. Longfellow's Golden Legend has reached a second edition at Paris.

LOVE WITHOUT NONSENSE.

NOT A BIT LIKE A NOVEL—A CAPITAL TAKE-OFF ON THE MODERN HIGH PRESSURE STYLE OF DOING IT.

ONCE upon a time there was a fair young maiden, whose name was Mary, although they called her Moll for short. She wasn't a tall, dark-eyed maiden, with clear, transparent skin, and lips like cherries, and cheeks suffused with blushes. She didn't have glossy black hair, sweeping back in wavy tresses from her queenly brow, and her form wasn't a bit like Hebe's. No, there was none of those things; on the contrary, she was short and thin, and had red hair and freckles, and she sported snaggle teeth and wore pads, but still she was a right nice girl; and there was a young man who fell in love with her, and his name was Bill, although his friends called him William when they wanted to hurt his feelings, for he didn't like it much. He wasn't fine looking, and had neither curly brown hair nor a moustache. Not much. Bill laid himself out on soap locks, and wore a goatee that he had dyed twice a week.

Now this Bill, he was in love with Mary, but he did not go and make a deliberate ass of himself? Did he, I say, go into a grove with her, and in the soft moonlight, by the streamlet that murmured sweetly by, and with the tender zephyrs sighing through the foliage, fall down on his knees, seize her jeweled hand. and breathe his deep affection in the tender accents of fond attachment, and swear "by yon bright orb above us, always to be thine?" Did he, I say? You can just bet he didn't. You can lay out your whole revenue safely on that. William knew too much about the price of pants to go flopping around on the wet grass with his good clothes on; besides, he never cared anything about streamlets, or any kind of cold water, except to mix with his gin. No, sir; it was exceedingly strange; but this infatuated William met her at the alley gate, and he stood right up on his legs, and says: "Say, Moll, old gal, s'posen we get hitched?"

But how did Mary behave? Did she go dropping to sleep over on the bricks in a dead faint, or did she hide her gentle head on his shirt bosom to conceal her blushes? No, she didn't; and she didn't say, "I am ever thine, my own love, dear William!" Oh! my, no. She looked right in his yellow eyes and says, "I'm in, Billy; I'm the gal for these sort of things. Go in!" And instead of referring him to her father, she only said: "Won't the old man bust right out when you tell him? Ha! ha!" and she laughed. But she didn't ask William to mollify her fond father. No, no. She very wickedly advised him to "poke the old man in the nose if he gave him any of his lip." She was a funny girl, this Mary.

Now, the old man wasn't wealthy, for he sold soap fat for a living, and so he didn't think Bill was nosing around after his money; so, when Bill asked him, he neither ordered him fiercely away, nor did the dewy moisture gather in his eagle eye, as he passed his hemstitched up there and said: "Bless you, my children, bless you!" Oh, no, nothing of that sort. He just blew his old red nose on his bandana, and told Bill to take her along, for he was glad to get rid of her, so he was, and William would be the same way soon, for she was awful rough on victuals, and always broke plates when she got mad.

So, you see, there really was no necessity for William to come at midnight's solemn hour, in a cab, and throw a rope ladder up to her window, and whistle three times on his fingers, and then go up, hand over hand, and bring her down in one hand and her trunk in the other, and a hand-box and umbrella under each arm, and a whole lot of bundles, and then get into a cab and fly to some distant shore. That's the way it would have been in a novel; but Bill said he wasn't on that lay, so he just went out in the yard, and, out of pure joy, he skinned the cat three or four times on the grape-vine arbor, and then went and got his butcher cart, and drove Mary right down to the magistrate, to get the job done for a quarter—for he said he was some on the low price, he was.

But the queerest thing of all was that Bill had no tall, dark, ruffianly rival, with a scowling visage and black whiskers, who flew at him with a drawn dagger and a horse pistol in each hand, and a muttered curse on his lips, and cried wildly for "Revenge. Ha! ha!" and said "Sdeath!" and "Villain, thou diest!" Not any. There was another fellow in love with Mollie, to be sure, but he was a weak-eyed young man, who had sandy hair and wore spectacles and a choker collar, and always looked scared when you hollered at him. So, when he saw that Bill had the best of the girl's affections, he looked all serene, and said, "Go in Billy, if you hanker for her;" and as Billy was a trifle on the hanker, he sailed right in.

So William, you see, had no trouble at all—and you couldn't get up an agonizing novel about him, if you tried. He didn't have any urgent business that called him to a foreign land; so he had to bid her a fond good-bye, and swear always to be true, and then go away and forget her and fall in love with a dark eyed Italian girl, picking grapes in a vineyard, with a square towel folded on her head, while his forgotten and forsaken Mary gradually faded and pined away, and baffled the physician's skill, and grew paler, and last, when the June roses were in bloom, lying gently down to die, while through the open window floated in the balmy odor of jessamine and honeysuckle. And William didn't come home at last, and, filled with deathless remorse, go daily to the sweet cemetery and strew flowers on her grave, and teach his children to lisp her name. Not at all. That is the way Mrs. E. D. E. N. Southworth would have done it, but she wasn't around. Billy was a butcher, who wore a white shirt and shiny hat, and he stayed at home and killed beef and sold it at a big price, and he stuck to Mary, and she kept healthy and wasn't much on the pine or the fade, while if any fellows got to lurking around, William went right out and batted them in the eye. He did.

And then, at last, when all was over, Mary didn't sit in the room while they dressed her in white, and mixed orange blossoms in her waterfall, and then gently went down stairs with six bridesmaids at her heels, and stand up with her William, and weep gently while she was being married by the minister, and then get lots of presents, and then go to her new house, and live through all the happy years with Billy, and never know sorrow or trouble any more. Why, of course she didn't, for it wasn't her style, you see.

She just rushed up stairs and put on her pink muslin and her old sun bonnet, and had nary bridesmaid, and went to the magistrate's and never wept a particle, and got no presents except fifteen cents from the old man to pay her car fare home, and when she got to the magistrate's she just rose up off the bench and told Bill she didn't see much use in splicing, and that she didn't like him anyway; and so she went home, and Bill went with her, and told her he wasn't sorry, as he didn't want her, and he guessed she was hard on her clothes, any how, and so they never got married, and the whole thing turned out wrong; but I couldn't help it, for I ain't going to put facts on record that ain't so. But it ain't a bit like any novel that I ever read, so there must have been something strange about this fellow and Mollie that I never could find out, so I'll have to let it slide as it is.

ADVANTAGES OF BEING POOR.

BY JOHN QUILL.

PROBABLY there is not a poor man anywhere on the globe who don't think he would be happier if he was rich, and there are several millions of poverty-stricken human beings who are working and worrying and cheating and lying to get rich, under the erroneous impression that they can enjoy themselves better if they live in a brown-stone house and have an incalculable number of greenbacks. If these discontented fellows knew the truth they would understand that they possess advantages which the rich can't enjoy. In fact, I think a rich man is to be pitied, and if any kind-hearted man would go round and relieve the poor wretches of their stamps, he would be a public benefactor. If any rich man feels distressed and wants to start a fellow on a duty of this kind, I am willing to sacrifice myself and open out on him to any extent.

A poor man never has any taxes to pay. He can sit down and laugh the assessors to scorn, and read the big appropriations made by Councils with a feeling of indescribable exhilaration, for he don't care a cent, and it makes no difference to him how much money they spend; and this, leaving out of the question altogether his chances for the kingdom of heaven, where he has the lead on the rich man, beside having a better chance for life. Nobody wants him to die; nobody is laying around in misery and impatience on the anxious bench, waiting for him to die so as to absorb his funds. On the contrary, it is to the interest of the poor man's friends to preserve his life, so that the funeral expenses won't come on them, and there will be no hack hire to pay.

A poor man, I say, can enjoy life more He lives in a rented house, and it needn't worry him any to see it abused, and his equanimity need not be disturbed if it burns down. He can sit down and look at the charred remains, like Marius amid the ruins of Carthage, and feel as cool as an acquaintance you've lent money to, and as collected as last year's rent he needn't care a particle.

And a poor man, he can repose in the bosom of his family and know that there is no avaricious young man prowling around after any rich daughters of his, and it is a matter of rejoicing with him that there is no occasion for him to play heavy father, and hurl a parent's curse at the unnatured child, who runs away, and who he cuts off with a shilling. He would only be too glad to have a shilling to cut anything off with or to spend. That is his particular complaint, as a general thing.

Why, an uncle of mine had a brother-in-law who was a poverty-stricken sort of a fellow, and who was never personally acquainted with a ten dollar bill until a rich aunt left him a million, when he was so overjoyed that he drank himself into a first-class delirium tremens, and he was so much afraid that perhaps the old lady might be still alive in her grave that he spent every cent he had in building a monument to hold her down, and he was so distressed to find himself poor again that he went out and sat down under it to shed his tears, when it blew over on him and drove him six feet into the ground, and killed him as dead as an ex-President. So that was all the good his money ever did him.

Beside, if you are poor you have no poor relations hovering around you and living on you, and if you are worried with curiosity you have a better chance than a rich man has of going to the poor-house, and, seeing for yourself how our public charities are conducted It's a blessed privilege, and it is vouchsafed to no human being who is cursed with a bank account.

A man in this situation is more to be envied than a boy who once lived out in Donega, Pa., and who was reared in the lap of luxury, and whose father gave him a quarter of a dollar a week for spending money. For what did this unhappy child of fortune do but go to a side-show in town and fall in love with the fat woman, who so far from reciprocating his youthful affection, told him she would melt over him if he didn't leave, and then she called the door-keeper, who put him out, and didn't give him back his money at the door. This boy, I say, behaved in this scandalous manner, and then under a plea of a blighted heart, he went home and nearly brought his father's grey hairs in sorrow to the grave, by endeavoring to cut his throat with a table leg, and blow out his brains with a brass-nozzled bellows. Now if this boy's father had been poor, the boy would not have had a quarter to visit the side-show, and his life would have been calm and serene.

Another thing, no poor man is ever worried by debt, for nobody will ever trust him, and when he does see a greenback he heartily enjoys it. Money falls on a rich man, he gets tired of it; but a poor man can drink it in with exhilaration. I used to know a man who had been in the depths of poverty so long that the rustle of a dollar bill would throw him into a spasm, but he was happy over it, and he said he didn't care. This was a very eccentric and singular man, and he used to remark that one advantage he had was that when he died he would leave no money to any public charity, and then have it spent on something else, and have fighting over it, and let the lawyers work off about four-fifths of it.

He said he was never bothered with anything of this kind, and he revelled in it, and was a great deal happier than a friend of his, who no sooner made a fortune speculating in oil, and putting up ground floors, than he broke out all over with boils, and was never happy unless he was being cupped and bled. This man was utterly wretched, and often he would go up into his silent chamber and sit down and cry like a baby because his income was so large.

Sometime ago a wise philosopher proposed to start a society for the amelioration of the condition of the rich. Need I say that I go for the movement? Need I say that I would accept a position as president of that association, and would lend my earnest attention to impressing upon the wealthy men of this community the importance of obtaining unalloyed bliss by increasing the salaries of the officers? It is hardly necessary, but in order to remove any trace of doubt in the minds of moneyed men, I would just advise them to try me.

A YOUTH AT SARATOGA.—A Saratoga correspondent speaks of a young man at one of the hotels there whose sole enjoyment consisted in being brushed. He had obtained twenty-five dollars' worth of new quarters at the sub-treasury, and every time he was brushed he handed one of these forth from his waistcoat pocket. He was brushed everywhere. The waiters watched for him, lay in wait for him, quarrelled with each other for possession of him. They never brushed him anywhere but in the small of his back and on the knees of his pantaloons. The result was that in three days those portions of his attire were threadbare. Nearly all his stamps were gone. He gave notice at the office of his departure for home. He had just money enough left to pay expenses, and he was brushed to the last—brushed into the stage. The waiters found in the aggregate they had received $21.25 for brushing that munificient and verdant young man.

SOME idea of the enormous consumption of baked beans in Boston on the Sabbath may be gathered from the fact that one baker at the South End, who sells these edibles by the quart, already cooked, disposed of no less than six bushels of baked beans one Sunday morning, recently, or about two hundred quarts, at sixteen cents a quart; and this in a vicinity where cooking stoves are abundant and many people bake their own.

SCHOOLS OF PAINTING.—The distinguishing feature of the Florentine school of painting is grandeur and sublimity, with great excellence of design; but a want of grace, of skill in coloring, and effect of light and shade. The character of the Roman school is equal excellence of design and a superior knowledge in coloring. That of the Venetian is the perfection of coloring and the utmost force of light and shade, with an inferiority in every other particular. In the Florentine school Michael Angelo ranks first; in the Roman, Raphael d'Urbino, and the Venetian, Titian.

MADAME DE BOISSY'S "Recollections of Lord Byron" are to be published during the autumn. These Memoirs by the Italian Contessa have always been expected—and if the lady has told the truth about her famous English lover, her tale will be a very strange one.

SAN FRANCISCO, ... SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 1867.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE ELECTION.

IF we regard the recent election in this State, merely in the light of a popular choice between Mr. Gorham and Mr. Haight, with reference to their respective qualifications for the office of Governor, the result is one that can be contemplated even by the most zealous Republicans—except those whose hopes of office have been disappointed—without poignant distress. If all the facts of the case when fully considered, justify us in coming to the conclusion that the defeat of the Republicans was the result of the dissensions in the party, arising out of the circumstances under which the nomination was obtained, or of a general belief that the leading men on the successful ticket are personally better candidates than their opponents, or of the manner in which the labor question has entered into politics and affected the election, or of the alarm excited in the minds of the ignorant by demagogic representations of the danger of the Chinese being admitted to the right of suffrage, or of the operation of all these causes combined, if we say the Republican discomfiture can be satisfactorily accounted for upon such grounds as these, it is after all, a matter of no great moment, except to the comparatively small number for whom the event has the bitter sting of individual loss or failure.

But there is another light in which it can be viewed, and in which many loud and exulting voices are already raised to declare that it must be viewed, that gives it a far greater, and to many minds, a terrible significance. The Morning Call claims that it is nothing less than a popular verdict against the Reconstruction Policy of Congress, a verdict in favor of Andrew Johnson against that body, and it is to be presumed that the Democratic press generally, will insist that it should be so regarded. But is this all? May it not, in connection with the Connecticut election, be taken as marking the commencement of a great reactionary movement in the popular mind, involving not only a revolution in public opinion so far as the Congressional Policy is concerned, but even so far as the war itself and its original ground and justification are concerned? It is a fact not to be disguised that there are those who thus interpret these elections, hailing them as tokens that the people of the North are "returning to reason," and that the utter overthrow of "the Radicals" is at hand; and it is well to remember that men of this way of thinking, when they speak of "Radicals," use the term in a sense sufficiently comprehensive to embrace all who approve of the emancipation proclamation, and, indeed, all who were in favor of coercion for the preservation of the Union. If this view of the significance of the recent elections is correct, we may look at no day distant for a new and astounding phase in our politics. We must not shut our eyes to the fact that the sentiment of "loyalty" and devotion to "the Union," has, in many minds, been greatly weakened by an experience of the costs of the war, and the burdens of taxation. The tax-gatherer has been a most cogent reasoner on the side of the Democracy, and undoubtedly he has made more Democratic votes, than their most eloquent orator. If such is indeed the significance of the recent elections, if it is an idication and commencement of a re-action in the popular mind against the feeling that caused the North to spring to arms at the news of the firing upon Fort Sumpter, it will most surely develop itself in the Presidential election of November 1868, in an attempt either to repudiate the Federal debt or to assume and pay the Confederate debt.

THE JAPANESE IN CALIFORNIA.—The Times, yesterday, stated that the Japanese, at present in this city, were being educated in the public schools, but that shortly a school would be established expressly for them, which would be under the management of Forbes Maitland. The fact of the matter is, that the only school for the Japanese, in this city, was established by Mr. Maitland, with the kind assistance of merchants interested in the education of the Japanese. The students, at present in this city, partially defray the expenses attendant on their tuition. The Board of Education, which has already established a Chinese school in this city, has under consideration the advisability of instituting a school for the numbers of intelligent and knowledge-seeking Japanese who will flock to our shores. The present school is at 225 Minnie street.

MRS. CHILD'S new story, "A Romance of the Republic," is republishing in London, by Messrs. George Routledge & Sons, under the title of "Rosa and Flora."

A LITERARY PIRACY.—The Times has for some time past evinced painful proofs of insanity whenever it has touched on literary matters. Not content with robbing Shakspeare of the credit of writing the plays commonly attributed to him, and giving the honor to Lord Bacon, it now boldly declares that the famous "Jumping Frog of Calaveras County" was bred in the brain—not of "Mark Twain" whilom the rather dull and twaddling local of the Call, but to that brilliant and world-renowned humorist, Sam Seabough, whose exquisitely ludicrous leading editorials in the Alta not long since, each morning set the town in a roar. This statement is embodied in the following paragraph which appeared in the Times of Friday:

"NOT EXACTLY THE CORRECT THING.—'Mark Twain' is 'doing' the Holy Land, and writing letters thereon, which the Alta copyrights. We must confess to experiencing some doubt as to his originality when we are told that his famous story 'The Jumping Frog of Calaveras,' was really written by Sam Seabough, now of the Sacramento Union, and by 'Mark' appropriated for his own."

Will not the Times confess to experiencing some doubts as to whether or not "Mark Twain's" letters from the Holy Land are original. Is it not probable that a young man of the name of Brown is the author of these letters. Did not "Mark Twain" when in this city steal the brilliantly witty sayings of Fitz-Smythe, re-vamp them and pass them off as original? We consider that the Times every day publishes more laughable things than this literary pirate, ("Mark Twain" was a pirate before he came to this country—he owned a piratical flat boat on the Mississippi) ever wrote in his life; but it has never made a better joke than that contained in the paragraph which we quote.

NEW YORK CITY TAXES.—New York city taxes for State, city, and county purposes reach this year the amount of twenty five million dollars, only four dollars on every one hundred. This does not include the tax for the support of the national Government, nor the large amount to be assessed on property owners for various corporation jobs, which from time to time are rushed through the Common Council. Life at this rate, must be a burden to a man of property in New York city. The Herald terms this legalized levy, "practical confiscation."

Now is the time for trimmers and time-servers to make new political affiliations. The recent State election indicates a re-action of popular feeling. If this re-action goes on, the Republicans will become a helpless minority, and the Democrats will rule the political roast. All ambitious young politicians who aim above all other things at advancing themselves, and who have no awkward and inconvenient scruples to stand in the way of self advancement, should ponder these things.

PACIFIC NEWS ROOM.—Messrs. Hudson & McCarty, advertising and commission agents, will open a news and reading room under the above title on Monday next, on the first floor of the Merchants' Exchange, fronting on California street. They have already four hundred different newspapers on file, and will shortly make an addition of near two hundred Eastern and Foreign journals and periodicals. These rooms will be free to the public during the coming week.

"THE BROADWAY."—The first number of "The Broadway," Messrs. Routledge & Sons' "International Magazine," is advertised to contain a poem by Robert Buchanan, a comic illustrated paper by Ernest Grisct, and an article upon "William Cullen Bryant and American Poetry" In spite of the promised "international" character of "The Broadway," no American names appear in the list of contributors to this initial issue.

THE latest New York novelty is a "swimming academy," which was to have been opened in August last, upon a plan similar in some respects to that of the late swimming bath on Third street. The basin of the New York Bath is of white marble, with a sloping floor which gives three feet of water at one end, and seven feet at the other. The water is kept pure by a constant current, and during the cold weather it is warmed by boilers.

ON the sixth page of the present issue of the CALIFORNIAN, will be found Prentice Mulford's highly characteristic and popular sketch entitled, "The Life and Adventures of Barney McBriar, the Shootist." The sketch originally appeared in the Golden Era of this city, and has been intensively copied by weekly literary journals throughout the United States.

THE last number of Blackwood's Magazine contains a bitter article on the subject of our national debt, and the financial prospects of the country, in which all sorts of dismal things are predicted concerning us. Among other pleasant prophecies, the writer sets it down as a strong probability that we will repudiate the Federal debt.

THE society of California Pioneers will celebrate the Seventeenth anniversary of the admission of California into the Union, on Monday next, at Maguire's Opera House. The exercises will consist of an oration by Wm. H. Clarke Esq., and a poem by Charles Warren Stoddard, Esq.

THE DEMOCRATIC VICTORY.

NOW that the election is irretreviably lost for the Union party, there is doubtless to day many an individual of the registered five thousand who did not vote, indulging in a little silent lamentation over the result. There was spite and sullenness and ugliness and antipathy to Gorham and McCarthy, and all this combined, prevailed. But now that the Democracy is victorious, and the Republican banner, for the first time in seven years, borne back before an elated foe, a feeling of regret not unmixed with a trifle of condemnation, has taken possession of the previously indifferent non-voting Republicans.

Will the Democracy make a good use of their victory? Will they cease to emulate the example of the Bourbons, and learn some degree of moderation preached to them during years of defeat and disaster. Let them remember that their success is not a true indication of the real political sentiment of California. Arrayed against itself, with several of the most influential organs in the State working against the Union nominee for Governor, and influenced, not merely by political antipathy, but by bitter personal prejudice, the result might, in some degree have been expected. Let the Democracy now shun arrogance, practice moderation, and be thankful for a victory that circumstances, not principle, have given them.

THE BRAIN.—Comparative anatomy has thrown great light on the subject of heads, and the brains which fill them. Begin at the lowest form of animated being, and you find no inclinations of a brain. The coralines and zoophytes, the testaceous and mulluscous animals, are destitute of brain, and many of them of a spinal marrow. In insects, a very minute brain is to be detected, and the development of what we may call intelligence in them seems to bear an exact proportion to it. The higher we rise in the scale of an animal creation, the more voluminous and complicated becomes the brain, and in an equal degree the more numerious and decided the manifestations of intellect. Thus the comparative physiologist has arrived at the conclusion that "in as far as an animal is capable of profiting by existence—in other words, as far as it is educable, if the expression may be used—it appears to be intellectual, and it is so, almost uniformity, in proportion to the development of the brain. Thus, of all animals, Man, who has the largest and most complicated brain, is the most improvable.

THE Indians on the Plains, like the Democrats in California, seem to be having things pretty much their own way. Hostilities are going on at various points, and thus far the record, judging from our sources of information, does not seem to be in favor of the United States Troops. Fleet horses, hardy warriors and untiring spirit, tracking the foe day and night, stampedes and ambuscades are sore trial to bodies of men trained to fight according to the white man's military regulations. The Indians also contend for what he considers his own territory, an incentive which in every age and with every people, has been the productive of hard fighting.

NEW MUSIC.—We have received from Messrs. Frisbie & Scott, music dealers, S. W. corner of Kearny and Sutter, a valse, entitled "Her Pretty Smile," composed by Gustave A. Scott. The composition evinces talent, but we doubt whether the title Valse élégante, which appears on the title page, can be justly applied to it. There is more of "force" than "elegance" in it. Having made this slightly adverse criticism with regard to the title, we have nothing worse to say. Mr. Scott is a musician of acknowledged ability, and "Her Pretty Smile" does him credit.

QUEEN EMMA'S CULTURE.—The Archbishop of Canterbury stated at a recent meeting of the Hawaiian mission, that he "knew few English ladies who could bear comparison with Queen Emma, of Honolulu, in a knowledge of the English language and literature."

TINSLEY'S Magazine, which is another new illustrated monthly, leads off with two serials—one by W. H. Russell, whom everybody knows as the Time's correspondent from everywhere, and the other by Mr. Edmund Yates, who is to edit the magazine.

A CITY WITH BUT ONE OWNER.—Every foot of land on which Belfast, Ireland, is built, is owned by one man, the Marquis of Donegal. Every citizen has to pay tribute to him. His income for ground rent is from one to two millions of dollars per annum.

M. LOUIS BLANC is understood to be preparing for publication a collection of the private papers of the Emperor Maximilian.

BESIDES "North Coast Poems," already announced, Mr. Robert Buchanan has in the press a volume of prose, "David Gray, and other Personal Papers."

ANATOMICAL MUSEUM.—The new models lately added to this exhibition attract much attention. This collection of anatomical specimens and models is now very complete, and none can fail to be interested in inspecting it.

A WALK ALONG MONTGOMERY STREET.

A RIDE IN THE MISSION CARS, AND OTHER CITY EXPERIENCE.

PARIS has its Boulevards, New York its Broadway, and our city its Montgomery street, and considering the difference of population, I doubt very much if a better study of human nature, especially female human nature, can be found on the two former, than on our own principal thoroughfare on any fine day in the dry season, between the hours of 12 M. and 4 P. M.

There is no use denying the fact that San Francisco boasts many pretty women and girls, not after the stylo of wax work, but good healthy looking, buxom lassies, that appear capable of anything from a dance in a crowded ball room, to a seven mile walk before breakfast; there is none of that sickly expression that you notice on the faces of those women who live in a less bracing atmosphere, and who fear exercise because it is thought to make them stout, liable to pimples, and less fit to appear elegant in the drawing-room. With all this, however, they are given to fashion—and what women are not—and from the way they do dress, I have often thought that whatever New York may boast of, San Francisco has but few, if any, Flora McFlimseys, for all here appear to have more or less to wear, and as a rule they know how to wear it.

THE FASHIONS.

I confess having a liking for the present fashion of ladies dresses for out door wear, especially since the change of head gear has sent the waterfall, or chignon I believe they call it, from the back of the neck to the crown of the head, forcing the jaunty little hat well down in front, so as to serve as a guard to the bridge of the nose, and covering for the forehead, instead of being placed where, I think nature intended it should be. Then the decreased size of the chignon, now no longer than a baked apple dumpling, and the addition of a large curl, of some one elses hair, or a plat, that looks as if every chinaman had been robbed of his queue in order to furnish the quantity needed, thrown carelessly over the shoulder, or allowed to fall in front, adds much to the general effect, and seem to say that the wearer don't care a fig whether you like her appearance or not. Again, nine out of every ten of the women you see on the street, remind us of Englishwomen, who are renowned the world over for great development of figure; but whether this is nature, or a pair of those singular looking things to be seen in many shop windows at the present time, made with a spiral spring and horse hair, I am at a loss to determine, and now while speaking of these matters, I would suggest that at the next session of the Legislature, a law should be passed prohibiting their sale, and that the wearer, if a single woman, should be liable to prosecution for endeavoring to entangle men by reason of false pretenses.

The writer of a fashion letter would say that "skirts are now worn short and less in circumference than formerly," such is the case, and very convenient it is on a narrow side walk, but I can't say I like them. They are sensible, I will admit, but they have not the elegant appearance of a long full skirt. While our streets are dusty, or muddy, and they must necessarialy be one or the other, short dresses should be worn, but if side walks and crossings could be kept clean, give me a trail by all means, to make a lady look really elegant while on a promenade. Last, but not least, the boots, these, one of the most important articles in a ladies attire, must, as now worn, be instruments of torture rather than comfortable coverings for the feet. Why will women think that the high curved heel, with a surface of not more than half an inch in diameter, that gives no support to the body, is handsome? Men don't think so—they much prefer the old style, that, while looking neat, gives comfort to the wearer, and as men's tastes are frequently considered, when women get themselves up for the street, why don't they think of this, and dress their little "footsy tootsies" elegantly and comfortably at the same time.

A WALK DOWN THE STREET.

Let us start from the corner of Montgomery and Post streets at 2 P. M., and "do" the fashionable thoroughfare as far as Washington street, but remember no uncharitable remarks, fun if you will, but nothing more. In the first place no judgment can be formed of those of the gentler sex we meet any where between Post and Sutter streets, for there are the dry goods stores par excellence of the city. Women here for a time forget what they or others have on, and only think of what they shall purchase; they have no eyes except for the shop windows, and cannot spare a moment even to examine a dress that may be passing them, and that they have not seen before, and would like to see behind, were they not so near the stores that husbands and fathers so much dread, and that mothers and daughters have such a weakness for. The next block is rather better, for in it there is not so much to attract a woman's attention from the principal object of her appearance on the street, which is to be admired by the stormer sex, and to excite the envy of her own.

From Bush to Pine street would be a favorite portion of the walk were it not for the crowd of loafers (I might use a harder and more appropriate term) that infest the vicinity of the Russ House entrance, and that appear to have no better employment than rendering the pavement filthy with tobacco juice, and making remarks, many of them insulting, about ladies that pass within the foul atmosphere they create. This crowd is a nuisance—a crying evil—and the policeman on that beat should be instructed to do away with it at the earliest possible moment. But I will drop the disgusting, and go on with our walk.

MONTGOMERY STREET NOTABLES.

Here comes a pair of lovely girls that we often see, and as often notice; they are bosom friends, probably, for they are almost always together, and their dress is not unlike; of a light color, with plain, neat trimmings; turban hats well down over their eyes; short skirts and neat fitting boots, (they both have nice feet) and the most charming No. 6 Jouvins, cover what cannot be otherwise than pretty hands. One I have lately seen alone, and then she had changed her suit to black, as if in mourning for her companion. I was talking to a friend at the time she passed who knew her, and he received a most loving smile, one that must have made him feel queer, if not lost to all sensibility (he is a single man) and that even made me feel as I have in days long gone by, and that are sure never to return. I could tell her name, but won't do it—she might not like it. She and her companion are both full of fun and mischief, unless I am much mistaken in womankind, and the day may come when one or both will make some poor fellows' hearts ache.

Ah! here are the objects of my admiration. I have seen them a hundred times, and yet I know them not; they appear to have inexhaustable wardrobes, one of them particularly. I have seen her with no bonnet but a ribbon and rosette one day; a "turban" hat the next, a "saucer" the next, and yet on the following she wore a "flat" that would cover half an acre. Sometimes they wear short skirts, yes, very short ones; then they will have trails that rival a street sweeping machine. On one occasion they were in black, and on the next in all colors of the rainbow; occasionally they would wear long boots, and then short ones; and the way they carry their sunshades is wonderful; they are always held at the same angle, let it blow high or low, and the same number of fingers are used to hold them, the little finger being extended at an angle of forty-five degrees from the handle, as if intended to be particularly admired. This couple are evidently sisters, and I should judge them to be about forty-five years of age, or thereabouts. Possibly they are twins, they look enough alike to be, and they are the wonder of nine-tenths of those persons who observe the strange sights that are frequently seen in our city.

To describe all that one sees between the extremes of Montgomery street, (I stop at the foot of the hill) would require more paper than the city could spare. Hundreds of incidents occur every day, each one of which would make a repectable paragraph, and to tell all the little "carryings on" that can be observed might make mischief. As the city increases, and other streets become "fashionable;" more scope will be given; all will not be crowded into so contracted a space, and trivial matters, which are to-day "the observed of all observers," will then cease to be noticed. Not even on Saturday afternoon, when the matinees discharge their crowds of waterfalls and crinolincs. When we have our Park, and some hearable means to get to it, then there will be hope for us; but until then, one who desires to see the sights and fashionable costumes, must place his sole dependence upon Montgomery street, in which there is now a little more room since the brokers have been moved into another locality.

FASHION ECLIPSERS.

Nine tenths of the women you meet on our thoroughfares, dress in the height of the fashion, but there are some who go higher than that—who are the extremists of the extreme, and who render themselves conspicuous by reason of wishing to out-do all the rest of their sex. If the fashion is short skirts, they wear shorter; if long, you can hardly keep clear of their trails. If high boots are "all the go," then with them, garters become unnecessary; and with the present style of low necked dresses for balls and parties, goodness knows what their appearance must be on those festive occasions, if they carry out the same rule. I have noticed several of this class, and they not among those whose business it is to be conspicuous, and if they only knew how absurd they appear in the eyes of all who are more modest in their attire, they certainly must feel ashamed, and abandon their notions of fashion. There are two of the kind I refer to that frequent Montgomery street, and the Saturday afternoon performance at the theatres, and I am charitable enough to suppose they are in the employ of some milliners or dress-makers, who keep them as walking signs, and that they are not dressed according to their own tastes.

It is a source of wonder what the next fashion will be with women. Their hats cannot be thrown much more forward, and it will not do to make the short skirts much shorter, or less in circumference. Contraction must cease, there is no chance for more of it, consequently expansion must again take place, for style cannot remain at a stand-still for more than ninety days. The head-dress may change by reversing the order of things, that is, the waterfall can be placed on the forehead, and the hat on the back of the head; this would do, and after a little while it would be thought "quite the thing."

Enough of fashion. Let him who has nothing better to do, take the Montgomery street walk occasionally, and observe closely what can there be seen. Let him pay no attention to sideling glances, or smiles, but confine himself to observing women and her ways, and if he don't feel more convinced of the follies and vanities of this wicked world than he ever did before, and wonder where the money comes from to pay for all the finery he sees displayed, much of it on the backs of those who are not in easy circumstances, I am much mistaken. It forms a good study, however. Men can gain knowledge thereby, and single ones can learn what they will have to provide for, when once they are fairly entrapped, and are allowed the great blessing of being able to call some lovely young creature, wife.

IN THE CARS.

Our city cars are a great convenience at times, that is when you get one when you want it, and when you don't have to stand up all the way from your place of business to your home at the Mission, or South Park, or some other distant place, by reason of having to make room for ladies who should have been home hours before, looking out for the children, or having your dinner ready on time. It is my fortune to have to use the cars frequently—the Mission cars, I mean—those which run along Howard street, and that now give you the opportunity to test the depth of the sand thereon by walking half a block between Sixth and Seventh streets, because a culvert is being built directly under the track, and I am sorry to say they have caused me to do some tall swearing.

If you enter one of these cars about 4 P. M., somewhere about Montgomery and Sacramento streets, the probabilities are you will get a seat, and have room to spare, but by the time you reach Post street, you will have been gradually shoved up and squeezed into the smallest possible space, and then every new comer is one more than the car should be allowed to take, but conductors, like corporations, have no souls, and like the "Builders," will insure one and all a seat, and "take the chances."

CAR INFLICTIONS.

Your car is full, you desire no more passengers, and hope there will be no additions to the load, then the bell rings, the horses are brought to a stand, and Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Jones, with several little Smiths and Joneses, make their appearance, and of course expect that they shall be seated. Mrs. Smith may be very fair, very fat and over forty, but what cares she for that, she must have a seat, and scowls at every one, until some person with more kindness of heart than common sense, jumps up from his seat, no matter how tired he may be from a hard day's work, to make room for a party who have no more important errand than a visit to Woodward's or the City Gardens. Of course some other victim does the same for Mrs. Jones, and then the junior members are hoisted into their laps to wait for the first vacancy. How delightful it is to have these children next to you, they have probably been eating candy, and they will amuse themselves by wiping their fingers on your clothes, or hair, if they can get at it; they, if rather young, will probably stare at you fondly, and call you "pa," much to the amusement of your fellow-passengers, who then begin to compare to see if there is a likeness, thinking the child might not have been mistaken even at its early age. If an infant it will, nine chances out of ten, be taken with the colic, and then its yells are unceasing, until its fond mother adopts the usual method of stopping the child's mouth.

"The cry is still they come." Ladies from shopping expeditions enter with little bundles that contain, may be, a half a yard of silk or other material to match a dress that is a little too scant in the pattern; or a bundle of bugle trimmings, or other finery, the larger packages having been sent home before. These certainly expect a seat; they feel that they have a right to one; that they cannot be kept standing with such a load to carry, and they are seated, and then if one of them can only meet a friend who has been on the same errand, and who is returning home with about the same load, you will soon have to listen to a conversation that will have no other point than the contents of the stores on Montgomery and Kearney street, and the outrageous conduct of Mrs. Stitchmequick, the dressmaker, who failed to send home the last new dress in time for church on the previous Sunday.

MARKET RECRUITS.

But now comes a portion of the journey that is quite as disagreeable as the others. You pass Union Market, and if on Saturday afternoon you are seen to receive a number of motherly looking females with baskets free of provender for the next day; these very probably are deposited on your toes, or scrape your shins, as they are dragged through the narrow space between the seats. Then some of these marketers will have a piece of smoked salmon, or a bunch of fresh fish, or a raw beefsteak, that will be seen to come in contact with your tweed cloth or cassimere, if seated next thereto, and the first intimation you have of the damage your clothes has sustained will be on arrival home, when your fond wife will say, "Oh, my dear! where have you been? Your coat is all covered with grease."

A FEW SUGGESTIONS.

Now these are only some of the evils of riding in our city cars, there are many others I could mention, and dwell upon at length, and I may at some future time show them up. There is one thing I must speak of, however, and that is their great want of punctuality. Who ever found a car, when he wanted or had a right to expect it It? is too seldom that I ever did, and never that I know of, after dark, except the Theatre car, which is scarcely able to contain half that depend upon it as a means of reaching home late at night. I wish the officers and directors of our line lived at the Mission terminus, and that they had to depend entirely upon their cars, as they now run, to and from the city. We would then have some certainty as to their movements, and more of them after eight o'clock in the evening; and if they were compelled to ride outside in the dust or rain when more than a certain number of paying passengers are inside, there would soon be instructions issued that no more than a given number of passengers should be received, and then a crowd would be avoided. But these suggestions I fear will amount to nothing—it will go on as usual to the great discomfort of those who regularly patronize our city cars.

SOMETHING ELSE.

You'r a Gorhamite, ain't you, friend Squint? and he, I believe, is in favor of the Chinaman; now on this point I say "bully for him," for what the deuce would he do for house-servants were they all driven from the country, and he had to depend upon Irish girls for the duty. The subject of servant-galism is now exciting the attention of our housekeepers, and having had some experience in that line, and having given the matter much study of late, I propose, if agreeable, and we all live, to give you, about two weeks hence, a short lecture on the subject, and tell you what I know of it.

Yours, truly, GOPHER.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE TO THE "CALIFORNIAN."]

BOHEMIAN PALACE, AUG. 1867.

THE ROUTE TO THE GEYSERS.

My last was dated from Healdsburg. Here you take Foss' line of stages for the famous Geysers. Glancing at the driver, you survey him from head to foot and have looked upon a stalwart specimen of the genus homo, six feet four inches in height and weighing two hundred and thirty pounds. You are satisfied from his appearance that he is a cool, self-possessed man, and that there is no back-out in him with regard to the "Hog's Back" or any other back. He sings out "All ready," and taking the reins, the renowned Clark Foss cracks his whip and we are off for our destination. We soon reach Foss' station, have traveled over an ordinary road, and now commences a series of descents and ascents that continues until we reach the Geysers. We first reach the Sugar Loaf, a very steep mound, and next come to the Geyser Peak, an elevated point 6,000 feet above the level of the sea. We are then whirled along until we come to the "Hog's Back," a long back it is, stretching itself on the top of a conical shaped mountain for a distance of two and a half miles. As you quietly sit in the stage and glance to the right or left, you look into depths below measuring from 1,000 to 2,000 feet. A detour from the road six inches either way, and you may be hurled into eternity without a moment's warning. But there is but little fear of any such catastrophe. Having safely passed this porcine difficulty, you are driven along until you reach a point within two miles of the Geysers. Here you commence descending, and after having rapidly circled about the mountains some sixteen times, you reach the hotel adjacent to the springs, having made the distance in twelve minutes, and descended 1900 feet. Foss has beat his time, however, having driven over the ground in nine minutes. Safely arrived, you congratulate yourself and fellow-passengers.

ON A TOUR OF OBSERVATION.

The following morning, we are off with Mr. S. on a tour of observation. With satisfied stomachs, lively imaginations, and long sticks, we proceed up the Devil's Cañon, pass Eye Water Spring, cross the Bridge of Sighs, and enter Prospenrie's Grotto where are inexhaustable beds of epsom salts. Then to the Quartz Mill, where the earth beneath seems to be grinding itself into pulp, and we are next at the Devil's Ink Stand. This is a small hole about eight inches deep and eighteen wide, with a blackish hot water bubbling, which is an excellent substitute for ink. After passing over beds of magnesia, sulphur and soda, we reach the Witch's Cauldron, a seething, foaming well, where you can boil eggs in a minute or two, about five feet in circumference and three feet deep. We then pass to the Steam Escape Pipe, where a strong volume of steam pours out of the mountain side, and from which, in the night time, issue jets of varied-hued steam, rivalling the brilliancy of the rainbow. You next come to the Steamboat Spring, very hot and powerful, and making a noise resembling the sound of the paddles of a low pressure steamer. To the right is the Lover's Leap, where infatuated lovers could easily sacrifice earthly happiness for unknown bliss by jumping down some three hundred feet. Then comes the Great Register. Here tourists engrave their names. that future worlds may see they once existed, in name at least. African citizens, of American decent, are not allowed to register here unless they furnish their own jack-knives, and have a knowledge of the the A B C. Following this is the Lover's Retreat, where anxious disciples of Cupid bill and coo the sunny hours away. It is said that lords to ladies mated found this spot proof against marital infidelity and divorce—that is, that once having plighted their faith here they feel as if linked for time and eternity. Our guide next takes us by a refreshing cold sulphur spring to General Sherman's Lookout, from which point a magnificent view may be had of the surrounding scenery. Leaving here, we reach the crater of an extinct volcano, surrounded by a number of small boiling springs. Adjacent are congregated a variety of like springs, bubbling up from a mass of honey-comb rocks, in the centre of which has been placed a steam escape pipe which keeps whistling to the tune of time perpetual. The immediate vicinity about the crater contains beds of various minerals, sulphur, soda, putty, ochre, etc. The last of the wonders in this immediate locality is the Devil's Tea Kettle, a curious spring of hot mineral water that tastes like Japanese tea. So much of brief narration.

THE BATHING SPRINGS.

The principal bathing springs are five in number. The Indian Spring for neuralgic and rheumatic complaints, the acid bath valuable for all scrofulatic ailments, the steam sulphur baths for coughs, colds and all kinds of swelling, the alum baths for ophthalmic diseases, and the family bath for the ablution of children and delicate lady adults. The waters of all these springs contain marvellous curative properties, and have effected wonders in the invigorating and restoration of shattered constitutions. In a brief and hurriedly written newspaper correspondence, it is impossible to do justice to these extraordinary and marvellous works of nature.

PERSONAL.

Hon. Mr. Perkins, Postmaster of San Francisco, Hon. Frank Soule, Mr. Gamble, receiver at the Western Union Telegraph office, Mr. Willis F. Coplan of The Dramatic Chronicle, and others of your city are staying here and enjoying themselves by bathing, reading, fishing, hunting and other recreations.

In this personal note let me add that mine host, Shafer, thoroughly appreciates the editorial fraternity by having fixed up for them an exclusive sanctum where they can sit, chat and write with characteristic Bohemian nonchalance.

BACK AGAIN—FOR THE CALISTOGAS.

Returning we reach Foss' Station, where we can procure an excellent meal, there we take the stage for the Calistogas, a distance of eighteen miles. The country looks very beautiful as we ride along, and time seems brief until we reach

THE CALISTOGAS.

This is a location made beautiful by art, and while it has not the natural loveliness and attractions of the Geysers, still it is very inviting. A novel feature is introduced here in in the way of living. Instead of being huddled together as at other watering places in one large building, there are separate cottages arranged for families and single people. These cottages surround the main building, consisting of the dining apartments, parlors and clerk's office. Handsomely gravelled walks, with parks of flowers and shrubberry intervening, lead to the cottages. I am told that the proprietor has spent $200,000 in beautifying the grounds, and certainly your liberal and energetic fellow citizen Samuel Brannan, deserves great credit for the taste and charming simplicity displayed in making the Calistogas a place worthy of this expenditure. The springs are few in number compared with those at the former place, but there they have been made fashionable, and fashion is all the rage in this fearfully enlightened country.

BOUND FOR NAPA.

Departing from the Calistogas, after a ride of twenty-eight miles we reach the rural city of Napa and take a brief glance at it, and its surroundings. We called upon the popular Haas Brothers, who look to the interests of THE CALIFORNIAN in that City and vicinity. Of course we cannot forget to drop in upon Montgomery of the Register, and Beckwith of the Reporter, have a chat, grow merry over the dilapidated condition of our own real estate affairs, and finish by hoping that our corner lots will not be as few in heaven as they were on earth.

EN ROUTE FOR THE BAY.

Bidding our friends at Napa a hasty good bye, we jump on the Amelia, commanded by the courteous Captain Gallway, the Clerk's office being presided over by that genial and accommodating gentleman, Mr. Aime J. Douzel, and after a few hours' sail, gliding by that famous spot known as Mare Island and briefly glancing at the great and historic City of Vallejo, we finally step on terra firma and once more find ourselves swallowed up in the Queen City of the Pacific, an atom floating amidst a sea of seething, foaming, animal life.

A RETROSPECTIVE VIEW.

In glancing over the ground which we have journeyed, a general and brief view of its features may not be uninteresting. Sonoma and Napa Valleys have more than a State reputation. A rich soil, plenty of wood and water, good roads, and a delightful climate, are its great attractions. I have already written you of the much needed want, railroads, to develop the resources of these valleys, and without which the people are seriously affected, as they have no substantial channel through which their crops could find an outlet commensurate with their large producing interests. There are now hundreds of thousands of bushels of wheat, thousands upon thousands of cords of wood, and various articles of export awaiting shipment, but owing to the slow and limited facilities offered by wagons, months must elapse, and perhaps the rainy season intervene, ere they can find their way to market. It would seem to those deeply interested in the material progress of California, and especiall to moneyed men whose entire interests are in the development of the resources of this Coast, that the question of railroads being built through these valleys, should seriously demand their attention. The thousands upon thousands of dollars expended in political bribery and corruption, if invested in stocks of this class would yield a large percentage, give employment to a great number of honest laborers, and instead of undermining the social fabric would tend to build up a solid and substantial public improvement. If the money gambled away in the stock faro market were sensibly expended for some such practical work, how much preferable and lasting would be its benefits. When a people or a nation become so thoroughly selfish, that public and national interests, and made secondary and subservient to individual aggrandizment and selfish propensities, that people or nations have commenced to sow the seeds of distrust, and begin to develop a tendency not in harmony with our simple Republican institutions. If the citizens of California would, in the spirit of our Constitution, have the greatest good ensue to the greatest number, they must be watchful of their interests, and keep amongst themselves the means by which those interests are to be upheld. The observer of events cannot fail to see that this means is becoming rapidly deficient among the masses of the people, and that instead of money being equally distributed in the hands of the people generally, it is finding its way to individuals and wealthy corporations who part with it only upon the most positive assurances of an enormous interest. If the inhabitants of Sonoma and Napa valleys, watched their interests as it is the duty of free people to do, they would not to-day be begging of plethoric corporate bodies to come and build their railroads, offering ruinous prizes of their substance to that effect, but would themselves be able to be their own builders, stockholders and directors. It seems to be the tendency of the age for the people to give themselves up to political and moneyed monopolies, and finally when they find themselves betrayed, to resort to revolutions, local or national. Our history as a government will bear me out in these assertions, and I will add that its future history, under the light and guides now before us, will repeat itself, unless the people become the interpretors of the constitution and their own rulers. To the lover of Democratic-Republican institutions, to him who believes in the welfare and happiness of the masses, he can only view this alarming and fast increasing race of monopoly as a barrier growing up toward centralized powers, in every respect repugnant and foreign to the spirit of government. The history of railroads especially applying to this monopolizing tendency, and unless California would be at the mercy of tyrannical moneyed power, she must avoid the shoals upon which the people of New York, New Jersey, and other States have stranded themselves. DR. ANONIS.

INDULGENCE.

INDULGENCE must surely be the prime cause and instigation of vice, for its effects are most pernicious to the welfare of humanity, and to it we owe the ill so common to us all. Rich or poor, high and low, man uses this "forebearance of restraint." The rich, in order to stifle the qualms of conscience, when those riches have been amassed by crime, when acquired otherwise in order to gratify a penchant for spending their money. The poor, because they need a solace for the fancied wrongs society has afflicted them with. No matter what these indulgencies consist in, if they be ever so trifling, it will be held so dear, as to be second to health or future happiness, common sense will be discarded, advice listened to with sealed ears, and the poor indulger of his own baser nature will become the victim of an acquired appetite, which far from being appeased by humoring, makes him an easy prey to remorse and the sad, sad future of a shattered constitution. The ancient Greek poets before the dark ages held the idea that in man were two natures, one animal and one spiritual, which being at a period when the existence of the soul was not known, approached very near our present theory in regard to body and soul. They also believed in and prayed for, a future state wherein the animal might be discarded and the spiritual reign supreme. Now indulgence with them, belonged to the animal and was considered by far the most degrading part of their animal natures, and he was considered happy who could control this dreaded destroyer of the peace of mankind, In our present enlightened age (?) we are not a whit nearer the conquest of this "head and front of our offending," and it may with truth be said that we are far behind these primitive Greeks who lived previous to the Christian era. For the simple reason that they believed in a restraining of the animal and the ennobling of the spiritual, while we o this civilized epoch, strive with each other to see who can the most indulge the animal at the expense of the spiritual. Verily we have progressed, for here we are to-day, with the word of God for a guide, the wonderful improvements in science, and the facilitating aid of literature, to keep us out of the meshes of indulgence, still stumbling down the path of ruin, curbing no desire, giving free scope to our more and more vitiated and depraved tastes, and aiding with all our might and main the many vices that are consuming us, to a gradual destruction of the soul, by an indulgence of the baser promptings of the body.

FIVE YEAR'S EXPERIENCE.—Mrs. Margaret W. Deniston, of No. 34 West 27th Street, New York, who has had a Grover & Baker Machine five years, says: "I have used it constantly for all kinds of sewing, from the finest cambric ruffling to heavy English beaver cloth. I find it invaluable in dress-making, embroidery, boys' clothes, under-clothes of all descriptions, and bed and table linen of all descriptions. I have had operators on Wheeler & Wilson's Machine. They lost a great deal of time in winding thread. I have bought ready made done on Wilcox & Gibbs, and don't consider the work sufficiently strong."

ADVICES JUST RECEIVED BY MAIL ENABLE US to announce positively that the only gold medal for American Sewing Machines was awarded to Elias Howe, Jr., as the manufacturer of the best Sewing Machine that was exhibited There were eighty-two different Machines in competition for the prize, and Mr. Howe received the additional award of the Cross of the Legion of Honor, as manufacturer and inventor. The exact wording of the award is as follows:

HOWE MACHINE.	WHEELER & WILSON.
"Co operateur Elias Howe, Jr., promoteur de la Machine a coudre, Medaillo d'or."	"Wheeler & Wilson, pour la machine a boutonniere, Medaille d'or."
TRANSLATION.	TRANSLATION.
Co-operator Elias Howe, Jr., improvement on Sewing Machines, Gold Medal.	Wheeler & Wilson, for Buttonhole Machine, Gold Medal.

The official list of those who were made Knights of the Legion of Honor, as published in the Paris papers, reads thus: "Mons. Elias Howe, Jr., fabricant de machines a coudre exposant." Which, translated into English, reads: "Elias Howe, Jr., maker of Sewing Machines, exhibiting."

From this it will be seen that the medal awarded to Wheeler & Wilson was for a "Buttonhole Machine," AND NOT FOR THE SEWING MACHINE.

H. A. DEMING, Agent,
No. 137 Kearny street, near Sutter.

An American Knight of the Legion of Honor—Among the many who have been the recipients of medals and honors at the Exhibition at Paris, none stand so high on the list as the celebrated inventor and manufacturer of Sewing Machines, Elias Howe, Jr. The Emperor, who shows great tact and discrimination in these matters, has made Mr. Howe a Knight of the Legion of Honor, and the jury on Sewing Machines, who had the task of testing and awarding prizes for excellence, unanimously decided that Mr. Howe was not only entitled to great honors as the inventor of the Sewing Machines, but that he carried off the palm as a manufacturer as well, and to him was awarded accordingly the first of the only two gold medals assigned this class. The numbers who have called upon Mr. Howe, at his office, No. 64 Regent street, to offer their congratulations, prove that many besides the Emperor and the jury acknowledge the justice of the claim.—The Courier, London, England.

THE Cincinnati Times makes a note of a capitol story told by a rail-road conductor about

A CAR ACQUAINTANCE.

"One day last week," said he, "there came on board of the cars, from one of the up country stations, a very pretty, genteel young lady, on the way to the city. She was alone; so I waited upon her to a good seat, and made her as comfortable as possible. It was a few minutes before the starting hour, and she was so agreeable and talkative, that I lingered, and we had a pleasant chat.

"Afterward, when collecting the tickets, she detained me again an instant, and gave me some fine peaches, which she said came from her friend's orchard in the country; and, really, I began to think that I had not had so charming a passenger for many a day.

"Well, we arrived at the depot; and I then attended her to the carriage, handed up her carpet-bag' aud, after all, what do you think she said?"

Now, we thought, of course, that the young lady would say, very politely: "Thank you, sir," smile like a gleam of sunshine, the carriage roll off, and our friend John Van Dusen, the gentlemanly conductor, would bow an adieu, and with a sigh turn away and forget the matter, and we stated that as our natural supposition.

"No" said the conductor, "she did no such thing; but just as her foot was on the step, she turned, and with a sort of look I can't describe, observed:

"'You must consider this, sir, merely a car acquaintance. You must not expect to be recognized if we meet anywhere else!'"

John drew a long breath.

"What did you say?" we asked.

"Why I thought this rather uncivil, to say the least, so I replied, very quickly:

"'Certainly not madam. I was just going to remark that you must not feel slighted if unnoticed by me anywhere, except on the cars; for, really, we conductors have to be careful about our acquaintances.'"

"Aud the lady?" said we.

"She looked quite silly as she rode off, replied John.

"A keener response to an example of female "snobism" could not have been made nor better deserved.

TO ENCOURAGE HASH EATING.—An ingenious hotel proprietor has recently posted the follwing advertisement up in his bar-room, announcing, in the style of the great tobacco advertiser, that, "in order to overcome a natural prejudice against the use of hash, the proprietor will, on Monday next, place a two dollar and a half gold piece in a certain quantity of the hash; on Tuesday, one-half that amount in two pieces; on Wednesday one-third of that amount iu three pieces," and so on for a week.

THIRTY thousand enterprising young gentlemen iu Ohio, last year, promised to love, honor and "buy thiugs for thirty thousand bright-eyed dames and damsels;" and the thirty thousand dames and damsels blushed, and whimpered, and said they "never could go through the ceremony in the world;" and then very quietly accepted their destiny, and, on the whole, rather liked it.

"MISS SMITH, I wish to speak to you in private. Permit me to take you apart for a few moments." Miss Smith (who wasn't at all frightened)—"Certainly, sir, if you'll promise to put me together again."

WHY is a minister like a locomotive? We have to look out for him while the bell rings.

AYER'S AGUE CURE,

FOR THE SPEEDY CURE OF

Intermittent Fever, or Fever and Ague, Remittent Fever, Dumb Ague, Periodical Headache, or Bilious Fevers, indeed for the whole Class of Diseases originating in Biliary Derangement, Caused by the Malaria of Miasmatic Countries.

No one remedy is longer called for by the necessities of the American people than a sure and safe cure for Fever and Ague. Such we are now enabled to offer, with a perfect certainty that it will eradicate the disease, and with assurance founded on proof, that no harm can arise from its use in any quantity.

That which protects from or prevents this disorder must be of immense service in the communities where it prevails. Prevention is better than cure, for the patient escapes the risk which he must run in violent attacks of this baleful distemper. This "Cure" expels the miasmic poison of Fever and Ague from the system, and prevents the development of the disease, if taken on the first approach of the premonitary symptoms. It is not only the best remedy ever yet discovered for this class of complaints, but also the cheapest. The large quantity we supply for a dollar brings it within reach of every body, and in the bilious districts, where Fever and Ague prevails, everybody should have it and use it freely both for cure and prevention. A great superiority of this remedy over any other ever discovered for the speedy and certain cure of Intermittents is, that it contains in Quinine or mineral, consequently it produces no quinsmo or other injurious effects whatever upon the constitution. Those cured by it are left as healthy as if they had never had the disease.

Fever and Ague is not alone the consequence of the miasmatic poison. A great variety of disorders arise from its irritation, among which are Neuralgia, Rheumatism, Gout, Headache, Blindness, Toothache, Earache, Catarrh, Asthma, Palpitation, Painful Affection of the Spleen, Hysterics, Pain in the Bowels, Colic, Paralysis, and Derangement of the Stomach, all of which, when originating in this cause, put on the Intermittent type, or become periodical. This "Cure" expels the poison from the blood, and consequently cures them all alike.

Prepared by DR. J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, and sold by all Druggists, everywhere.

A HOSS TROTTING ARTICLE.

BY JOSH BILLINGS.

Agriculture is the mother ov provisions: she is also the grandmother.

Agricultur was fust diskovered by Cain, and has since been diskovered to be an honest way to get a very hard living.

Pumpkins owes awl her success tew agriculture, and so does lettuce and buckwheat.

The Billingsville Agricultural Society opened Oct. ten, and was a powerful success.

The receipts of the Agricultural Fair was upwards ov $20,000 (if mi memory serves me rite, and i think she duz).

FUST DAY.

A puss ov ten dollars was trotted for by colts, that had never trotted before for money.

The puss was won, amid vociferous exclamations, by a red colt, and the waving ov handkerchiefs, with a stripe in his face, and the fainting of several fust class females, and one white foot behind.

SEKUND DAY.

It rained like a perpendicular awl day, and no trotting could be had, so the audience awl went hum, cussin and swearing, and offering to bet four to six on the Pete Tucker colt.

THURD DAY.

The sun histed up in the east more butfuller than I ever saw her before (if mi memry serves me rite, and i think she duz.)

A puss of $30 was trotted for, by some 2 year old colts.

This race did not attract much attention, on account ov the time being so slow. Time, 2 minutes and 38 sekonds.

FORUTH DAY.

This waz for 3 or 4 year olds, who hadn't never beat 2:25.

Thor waz, 26 entrays; they couldn't all trot to once, so they took turns.

This race was wun, after a bitter contest, by Pete Tucker's colt.

He was immediately offered $1.000 and a fustrate farm, which was well-stocked, for the colt, by three different agricultural men, but with a great deal of indignant good sense, he skorned to stoop so low.

Pete Tucker and his whole family are awl hoss.

FIFTH DAY.

It rained again, harder than ever, and the day was spent in betting on the wait of hosses.

There was sevral good hoss-swops also made.

At the end ov the fifth day i come away.

I got so full ov hoss that ever since when i laugh i kant keep from whinnering.

The fare waz kept up 10 days, and some red hot time waz made.

Thiuk 2 minits and 10 seconds was made (if my memory serves me rite, and i think she duz.)

I forgot to say that there waz tew yoke ov oxen on the ground, besides several yokes ov sheep, and a pile of carrots, and some worsted work, but they didn't seem to attract enny sympathy.

The people hanker for pure agricultural hosstrots.

THE STRICKEN ONE.

Why sits that maiden sad and pale
Amid the glittering throng?
Why bears her face the marks of pain,
While heedless of the song?
Has he whom she so fondly loves
Left her young heart forlorn?
More poignant are the pangs she feels
She suffers from—a Corn.

To EPICURES.—There is considerable difference between a gourmand and a gourmet. In the gourmand the animal nature predominates, while the gourmet cultivates the sense of taste until it is rendered susceptible of receiving the highest gratification. The gourmand is satisfied to swill flat beer or sour wine, to eat ill-cooked viands, provided he can get enough to gorge himself withal. Epicures, or gourmets, who can appreciate the delicate bouquet of a fine wine as they delight in the perfume of the violet, should pay a visit to the store of F. C. Belden, No. 612 Sacramento street, where they will find the rarest brands of wines, spirits and liqueurs, the choicest teas and an immense assortment of delicacies, such as truffles, pate de fois gras, Stilton cheese, caviare. etc.

Paris Exposition, - - 1867.
ADVICES JUST RECEIVED BY MAIL ENABLE US to announce positively that the only gold medal for American Sewing Machines was awarded to Elias Howe, Jr., as the manufacturer of the best Sewing Machine that was exhibited. There were eighty-two different Machines in competition for the prize, and Mr. Howe received the additional award of the Cross of the Legion of Honor, as manufacturer and inventor. The exact wording of the award is as follows:

HOWE MACHINE.	WHEELER & WILSON.
"Co operateur Elias Howe, Jr., prometeur de la Machine a coudre, Medaille d'or."	"Wheeler & Wilson, pour la machine a boutonniere, Medaille d'or."
TRANSLATION.	TRANSLATION.
Co-operator Elias Hewe, Jr., improvement on Sewing Machines, Gold Medal.	Wheeler & Wilson, for Buttonhole Machine, Gold Medal.

The official list of those who were made Knights of the Legion of Honor, as published in the Paris papers, reads thus: "Mons. Elias Howe, Jr., fabricant de machines a coudre exposant." Which, translated into English, reads: "Elias Howe, Jr., maker of Sewing Machines, exhibiting."
From this it will be seen that the medal awarded to Wheeler & Wilson was for a "Buttonhole Machine," AND NOT FOR THE SEWING MACHINE.
H. A. DEMING, Agent,
No. 137 Kearny street, near Sutter.

An American Knight of the Legion of Honor—Among the many who have been the recipients of medals and honors at the Exhibition at Paris, none stand so high on the list as the celebrated inventor and manufacturer of Sewing Machines, Elias Howe, Jr. The Emperor, who shows great tact and discrimination in these matters, has made Mr. Howe a Knight of the Legion of Honor, and the jury on Sewing Machines, who had the task of testing and awarding prizes for excellence, unanimously decided that Mr. Howe was not only entitled to great honors as the inventor of the Sewing Machines, but that he carried off the palm as a manufacturer as well, and to him was awarded accordingly the first of the only two gold medals assigned this class. The numbers who have called upon Mr. Howe, at his office, No. 64 Regent street, to offer their congratulations, prove that many besides the Emperor and the jury acknowledge the justice of the claim.—The Courier, London, England.

GRAND TRIAL
....OF....
SEWING MACHINES.
CONTEST BETWEEN THE
FLORENCE AND WILLCOX & GIBBS.
THE
WILLCOX & GIBBS
TRIUMPHANT!

At the Great UNION FAIR, held at Island Park, between Albany and Troy, in September, two Premiums were offered on Sewing Machines, one for the BEST and the other for the "Second Best"—competition being open to the State.

On the first day of the Fair, the Troy Agent of Florence Sewing Machine Company, having, jointly with the Albany Agent of the same Machine, entered it for competition, published in the Troy Daily Times a challenge to Agents of other Sewing Machines, to meet them at said Fair and compete with them for the Premium.

The challenge was accepted by the Troy and Albany Agents of the Willcox and Gibbs Machine.

Each party was to prepare and subject to the judges a "list" of the several "points of merit" on account of which "superiority" was claimed. These "points were to be separately considered, thoroughly investigated and practically tested, by work done then and there, upon each of the machines; and then decided in favor of the machine which was adjudged to excel on that "point."

Finally it was agreed that the machine which, at the conclusion of the trial, should be found to have the greatest number of those "points" decided in its favor should be decided the "BEST SEWING MACHINE," and awarded the FIRST PREMIUM.

The result of the trial was, that the

WILLCOX & GIBBS WON THE VICTORY

and the prize, by the extraordinary superiority of thirty-five points, decided in its favor, against two points in favor of the Florence.

Full notes were taken of the trial.

It is a fact worthy of remark, that during the entire trial—which continued without intermission for nearly seven hours—not a stitch was missed, nor the thread once broken, nor a needle broken or bent, by the Willcox and Gibbs machine. No kind of work was attempted to be done on it that was not accomplished, and done in a perfect and workmanlike manner; and no effort was made on it that was not entirely successful; while neither of these statements can be truly made in favor of the Florence.

This remarkable trial can not fail, through the facts developed by it, to be productive of important results. It has raised the veil and exposed to public view the true character of the opposition, who will no longer be able to deceive the public by misrepresenting the character and merits of the Willcox and Gibbs machine.

It is an improvement on double thread machines; and its "stitch," which was severely tested by the Judges, was decided to be much stronger and less liable to rip in use or wear than the "Lock Stitch."

It is the simplest in construction—does the greatest variety of work—makes no noise—is not liable to get out of order—costs the least money, and gives the best satisfaction.

CUPID'S A. B. C.

FROM THE LONDON FUN.

Years have elapsed—many bright, many shady
(More than I'm willing to say),
Since I devotedly loved a young lady
Living just over the way.
Sweet seventeen, and as fair as a lily—
Show me the lily so fair;
What was the wonder I fell willy-nilly,
Head over heel in the snare?

Merely a clerk—not a year from school yet—
Wages and wits on a par—
Playing the Romeo to Somebody's Juliet,
Quite like a tragedy star.
How could I settle to commerce or trading
Tost on an ocean of care,
Brimful of doubts (as per Love's bill of lading),
Bound for the Gulf of Despair?

How did I waste my long mornings together,
While by my window I stood,
Waiting and watching, and wondering whether
Luck would be naughty or good.
Smiles and salutes, inexpressibly tender,
Daily went over the street.
I, at discretion, had made my surrender;
Why was not she as discreet?

Thanks—many thanks—for thy noble invention
Friend of the deaf and the dumb;
Lending an ear to the quick apprehension,
Speech to the fingers and thumb.
Dear little word, it was bliss to repeat:
First came an L, then an O;
Two other letters remain to complete it—
Need I continue? Oh, no!

Love, beyond pantomime billing and cooing,
Made very little advance;
Time, the old bully, takes pleasure in doing
Infinite harm to romance.
Now I believe—now the spell has been broken—
Love deaf and dumb is absurd;
Now I believe that if Passion had spoken,
Beauty would never have heard.

Exclusive Iron Railways.—A conviction has for some time been growing among the reading civil engineers of Germany that the use of wood in the construction of railways is a mistake. Wooden sleepers soon perish, especially in hot climates, and the cost and risk of renewal are alike great. If nothing but iron were used, the renewal would not be frequent, as at present, for the life of a good iron rail may be reckoned as thirty years; consequently, in different parts of Germany, railways have been constructed without the use of wood. The rail is made about nine inches high, with a broad flat base, which rests on a well prepared bed ballast, and when properly fixed, is further supported by a layer of gravel. Thus constructed, the jerky motion of a train, occasioned by numerous cross-sleepers, is done away with; the hammering sound becomes a steady continuous roar, the longitudinal bearing is distributed over a greater distance, and the need for repaires occurs but rarely. Some of the railway engineers in the United States have taken up the question, and come to the conclusion, that an iron permanent way is the best for their country, especially in the vast treeless regions of the Northwest. The iron trade is reported to have been dull of late: if all the railway companies resolve on adopting an iron permanent way, the demand for the metal in the new form would be so great, that the trade could hardly fail to be brisk for years to come.

TO THE UNFORTUNATE.
NEW REMEDIES! NEW REMEDIES!
Dr. Gibbon's Dispensary.

ESTABLISAED IN 1854,
616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco.
For the treatment of Sexual and Seminal Diseases, such as gonorrhœa, gleet, stricture, syphilis in all its forms, seminal weakness, impotency, &c. Skin Diseases, (of years' standing,) and Ulcerated legs, successfully treated.
HORRIBLE DISEASES.
How many thousands of persons both male and female are there who are suffering out a miserable existence from the effects of secret indulgence, or from virus absorbed into the system. Look at their pallid, emaciated and disfigured faces, and their broken constitutions, disqualifying them for the happiness of marriage or the enjoyment of life. In this horrid situation thousands suffer until death closes the scene. Let parents, guardians and friends, attend to those who are suffering with any of these horrible, life-destroying maladies—see that they are cared for and cured before it be too late. Send them to Dr. Gibbon, a physician who has made private diseases his especial study for years, and who is certain to cure the most inveterate cases without mercury or any injurious drugs. It is important to those who are afflicted, to be careful of the many pretended Doctors who infest all cities, publishing their skill in curing all diseases in a few days, imposing upon the public by using the names of eminent physicians from Europe and other places. Be therefore careful and make strict inquiry, or you may fall into the hands of these charlatans.
Syphilis is syphilis the world over; so is small pox, consumption, and other diseases, to the contrary of what quacks may say.
SEMINAL WEAKNESS.
Seminal weakness the consequent of self abuse. This solitary vice, or depraved sexual indulgence, is practiced by the youth of both sexes to an almost unlimited extent, producing with unerring certainty the following train of morbid symptoms, unless combatted by scientific medical measure; sallow countenances, dark spots under the eyes, pain in the head, ringing in the ears, noise like the rustling of leaves and rattling of chariots, uneasines about the loins, weakness of the limbs, confused vision, blunt intellect, loss of confidence, diffidence in approaching strangers, a dislike to form new acquaintances, a disposition to shun society, loss of memory, hectic flushes, pimples and various eruptions about the face, furred tongue, fetid breath, coughs, consumption, night sweats, monomania, and frequent insanity. If relief be not obtained, should apply immediately, either in person or by letter, and have a cure effected by his new and scientific mode of treating this complaint, which never fails of effecting a quick and radical cure. Dr. G. will give $100 to any person who will prove satisfactorily to him that he was cured by either of the San Francisco quacks.
Dr. Gibbon is responsible, and will give each patient a written instrument binding himself to effect a radical and permanent cure or make no charge.
Persons at a distance may be cured at home by addressing a letter to Dr. Gibbon, stating case, symptoms, length of time the disease has continued, and have medicine promptly forwarded, free from damage and curiosity, to any part of the country, with full and plain directions for use, for ten dollars, sent in a registered letter, or through Wells, Fargo & Co.
Address DR. J. F. GIBBON, 616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco, Postoffice Box 252.
CAUTION TO THE UNFORTUNATE.
Beware of the San Francisco quacks and pretenders who with bogus sworn-to certificates, dupe the unwary. Some of the self styled doctors whose names are to be found in all the daily and weekly papers of San Francisco and other places, are tradesmen, and become too lazy to work at their trade. Some are tinsmiths, shoemakers, newspaper carriers, intelligence offices keepers, etc. Look over the San Francisco City Directory and you will find their former occupation in it. Look at the Directory for 1862-63. The only way to avoid imposition is make inquiry—it will cost you nothing and may save you many regrets, for advertising physicians in eight cases out of ten are bogus, there is no safety in trusting any of them till you know who and what they are. Dr. Gibbon does not deceive people by exhibiting bogus titles, certificates, pretended patients' letters, etc. Dr. Gibbon Will satisfy persons who may call at his office of his ability to treat diseases that he proposes to cure.
☞ Persons writing to Dr. Gibbon will Please state the name of the paper they see his advertisement in.

BABBITTONIAN,
OR SELF-TEACHING
PENMANSHIP
The System of Babbitonian Penmanship is pre-eminently self-instructing. With its ample explanations of right and wrong forms—its sixty wood cuts—its plain intelligent rules, one may sit down by his own fireside and become a finer Penman than he could at much greater cost in the usual way with a living teacher.
There is a great demand for fine Penmen in the commercial world, and this system, at a trifling expense, imparts a skilful command of the Pen, worth hundreds of dollars to the fortunate possessor.
Penmanship is an indispensable accomplishment to Ladies, and this system is elaborate in a series of elegant copies in the Ladies' Style.
Business men have sometimes lost thousands of dollars from ignorance in regard to Business forms, and there is furnished in a set, without additional charge, a fine variety of Business Forms and Abbreviations. To sum up the Excellencies of this System, it is—
1—Scientific in its Arrangement of Principles;
2—Artistic in its Movements and Flourishes;
3—Practical in its Combinations and Applications;
4—Stylish in its neat and chaste Gracefulness;
5—Superior for Legibility, Rapidity and Beauty;
6—Most Disciplinary for fingers, Arms and Muscles.
7—Unexcelled for Comprehensiveness and Simplicity.
8—Complete and Self-Teaching for Private Learners;
9—Time, Labor and Expense Saving for Pupils and Teachers.
The Babbitonian Penmanship
Is published on durable card board slips, ninety-two copies illustrated, put in a neat package with a Chart, the whole complete at the low price of $1 50.
Babbittonian Pens.
One reason why the country is flooded with poor Pens is that they are generally made by mechanics, rather than by artistic and experienced Penmen, the only parties really understanding the requirements of a good article.
The Babbittonian Pens,
Made in the most finished style, by skilful artisans, after models prepared according to the combined wisdom and experience of several amateurs and old Professors of Penmanship, are admirably adapted to meet the public wants.
The Babbittonian Ladies' Pen,
Is one of the most exquisite little instruments for delicate writing ever constructed.
The Babbittonian Extra Fine Pen,
Is pronounced by a large number of Penmen to be more free, more durable, and more varied in capacity for either fine or coarse strokes than any foreign Pen whatever. Suitable for elegant writing, it is a great favorite with the ladies and gentlemen.
The Babbittonian Business Pen,
Having great freedom and variety of movement, is unequaled for general business or school purposes. Somewhat coarser than the Extra Fine, it wears longer and moves more easily on paper.
☞ This Pen is now in use in the large counting-houses and banks in this city.

A RARE GEM OF ART.
"The Lord's Prayer,"
A pen drawing, by Mr. D. F. Brown, is one of the most remarkable works of art ever exhibited in this country. By patient labor he has succeeded in producing a design which for skill and beauty of execution, exquisite softness and delicacy of finish, and general merit, it would seem scarcely possible to surpass. The central figure—the face of our savior—is one of marvelous power and beauty. This and the faces of the Twelve Apostles, forming the border of the piece, are faithful copies from Leonardo da Vinci's famous painting of the
LAST SUPPER,
Re-producing, with the softest and most perfect shadings, the conceptions and characteristic expressions of the originals. Within this enclosure the words of the Lord's Prayer, in ornamental letters of various original designs and exquisite finish, are an interesting study of art in themselves; while appropriately distributed among these, miniture groups and scenes of marked events of Savior's life, copied from the great masters—five of them from Raphel's celebrated designs—form a harmonious completion of this unique, beautiful and truly wonderful work. The faces of
OUR LORD AND HIS APOSTLES.
Alone, so finely copied, would be a treasure in any house, and worth the full price of subscription.

"Nil falsi audeat, nil veri non audeat dicere." CICERO.

Those Unhappy Turtles.

In no city in the world is there a greater necessity for a society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals than exists in San Francisco. The President of the Society, not long ago established in New York, has done good service in the cause of humanity. He has been sneered at for his endeavors to prevent turtles being unnecessarily tortured. He claimed that to expose a turtle to the rays of a scorching July sun for days together, on the pavement, was unnecessary barbarity, and succeeded in putting a stop to the practice. Turtles in San Francisco are treated badly enough. It is true that some attempt is made to lessen their sufferings by keeping them in tanks of water during the last few days of their existence, but the day of their arrival in San Francisco is a terrible one for them. One day this week four turtles were exposed, lying on their backs, on the sidewalk in front of a restaurant on Montgomery street. We must unwillingly record a fact which speaks badly for the humanity of our citizens. During that day five thousand persons passed those four unhappy turtles; out of the five thousand three thousand one hundred and seventy-two stopped and deliberately kicked one of the turtles in the stomach, one thousand and forty kicked the stomach of each of the four turtles, and five hundred inserted the ferrules of five hundred canes in the eyes of the unfortunate animals. There was no excuse for this wanton cruelty; these persons could not urge in extenuation of their conduct that they wished to ascertain whether or no the turtles were fat, as the thickness of the shell would preclude the possibility of finding this out by any such means. How different to the course pursued by these heartless, coarse and brutish beings was the manner of the epicures whose attention was attracted by the turtles! They gazed on them with silent respect, while their mouth watered as they reflected in how short a time they would be converted into the true ambrosia—turtle soup.

A Clerical Joker.

Dr. Stone who is called "Rev." Dr. Stone, is a great joker. He should be called Funny Dr. Stone in place of Rev. Dr. Stone. The Times of Thursday contains a report of the excruciatingly amusing address which Dr. Stone delivered at Sacramento, the day before, on the occasion of the opening of the State Fair. This is one of the jokes contained in it:

"He said he did not think he had power to charm into stillness that throng, but he would say as a stammering tithingman once said to the whispering boys, 'B-h-boys, b-h-be s-till up th-ere; if yo-yo-u d-d-don't, it is just as w-w-well.'"

Then we are informed:

"He told a very humorous and pat incident of a city lady who went into the country and took a fancy to play dairymaid. She went into the yard with a white apron on and a milk pail in her hand; but she met with no success. It turned out that she undertook to milk the wrong gender."

The delicacy of this story is only equalled by its wit. We wonder if Dr. Stone knows all the "funny" stories of that kind? The reverend joker then afforded his hearers the important information that:

"He liked fairs for their concomitants; he loved a fine horse; loved to see them trot; loved to see him trot his best. He loved to see him gallop; loved to see him gallop his best."

This is really interesting. Dr. Stone loves to see a horse trot; loves to see him trot his best. He loves to see him gallop; loves to see him gallop his best. He ought to have said whether or no he loved to see him canter; loved to see him canter his best. When reverend gentlemen attempt to be funny, they should avoid repeating indelicate jokes which they heard at college, and should, in attempting to place themselves on a footing of familiarity with their audience, restrain themselves from talking nonsensical stuff like "baby-talk," to rational men and women.

A Sensible Crest and Motto.

Oö-no-we, one of the retainers of the Prince of Satsuma, at present a student in this city, has a crest and motto which shows great good sense in that one of his ancestors who adopted them. The crest consists of three suns closed, diverging from the centre of a circle: the motto being interpreted is "keep cool."

The Higgins-Hayes Bet.

We were going to try to say some funny things about the charitable organ grinder procession, which caused such a sensation on Wednesday last; but not feeling bright, were very grateful to Harry Jackson, the funny man of the Metropolitan Theatre, when he came to our assistance and dashed off currente calamo the following comic song, which will, no doubt, become the popular song of the day, when circulated throughout the State in the columns of THE CALIFORNIAN:

THE ORGAN GRINDER.

Air—The German Band.

The other day I lost my way,
As on Montgomery I walked along,
For there met my view of thousands a few,—
A most tremendous throng.
My wife was out, somewhere about,
I didn't know where to find her;
At last, I guessed she was with the rest,
She'd followed the organ grinder!

CHORUS.

Now the Orphans' cause has gained your applause—
No people e'er were kinder
Than the Frisco folks so fond of jokes,
Who cheered that organ grinder.

I, followed too, and I'll tell you,
What I saw at this mass meeting:
There was Higgins the great, on account of Haight
George Gorham badly beating;
An organ he bore his breast before,
And Hayes was money finding.
They marched along in the middle of the throng,
For the orphans they were grinding.
Now the Orphans' cause, etc.

Put Bloomer was there with his jolly red nose,
He'd his skin full and felt quite hunky
On his back was the image of his only s[illegible],
In the shape of an elegant monkey.
Who'd look so gay as the hand would play,
No animal e'er looked kinder;
And he winked at the crowd as they threw their cash,
To that bully old organ grinder.
Now the Orphans' cause, etc.

The Emperor Norton was also there,
With new hat and rooster's feather;
He vowed and declared, in all his life,
He'd ne'er seen such a crowd together;
And slipping along the gutter side,
He collared a half a dollar;
"Says he, I'm an orphan, I'll help myself
To a feed and a new paper collar."
Now the Orphans' cause, etc.

There was little Blitz, near out of his wits,
Couldn't keep the hackmen steady,
And he cried, "Mine gott, I give you fits,
But now I don't got ready."
Frank Pixley I saw as I stood on a stool,
He'd ta'en from law a vacation;
He was looking round for his poor lost mule,
To pack all the grub donation.
Now the Orphans' cause, etc.

It made me feel gay, as I pushed my way,
To hear the silver ringing,
As the coin fell in showers around,
To the orphans comfort bringing.
There was even Mike Reese,
Whom none can fleece;
He felt his heart grow kinder,
A five-cent piece he drew from his fob,
And gave it to the organ grinder.

CHORUS.

Now here's three cheers—may they live for years,
And Fate to Higgins prove kinder;
May he ne'er again lose, and have to use
His license as an organ grinder.

The Hour of Victory.

From an advertisement in the Bulletin, we learn the interesting fact that the instant H. H. Haight, the Governor elect, was informed that he had a majority of 10,000, he had his likeness taken, we suppose, in order that he might see how he looked. "The expression of the portrait is singularly felicitous, and is taken at the very moment when the majority of 10,000 was declared to its most worthy recipient." George C. Gorham did not have his likeness taken at the moment he heard of his defeat, as blue is the color which does not photograph well.

The "Alta's" Old Lady Correspondent.

The Alta, not content with its regular editor who writes the heavy leaders and Paris and London letters, has engaged another old lady to write letters for its columns. The name of this venerable party is "Hagar." On Sunday last she discoursed of the City Gardens. The ancient dame recalls the recollections of seventy-five years while looking on at the game of croquet She says:

"I must confess my ignorance of the game of croquet. It was not played in my young days—in fact, no game was played for amusement in those times. What vast changes have been brought about during the past seventy-five—yes, even during the past sixty years. How memory will wander back to those early days in our nation's history. I remember when it was considered a deadly sin to drop a prayer book upon the floor, though by accident—when amusements were indulged in only by stealth, and most musical instruments were denounced as soul-destroying agents."

How touching a sight it must be to see this dear old lady sitting, spectacles on her nose, and snuff-box on the table by her side, carrying herself in thought back seventy-five—or say sixty years to those early days in our nation's history, when it was considered a deadly sin to drop a prayer book upon the floor, though by accident. Seventy-five—or say sixty years ago! Poor old lady! Wonder where the Alta found her. Her services to that paper are invaluable. Unless other stringent measures are taken to check the unseemly flippancy of Fitz-Smythe, it will be necessary to hunt up one more Hagar and thus keep the general old-lady-like tone of the Alta unimpaired.

Hair Flowers.

The ladies of California are not known to excell ladies in other parts of the world in painting, drawing, music or languages, but that they can whip creation in the art of making hair flowers must be conceded. We have nothing to say against hair jewelry. The desire to possess a lasting memorial of a departed friend, formed from what was actually part of him or her during life, is a natural one, therefore, when we read in the Bulletin's report of the Fair at Sacramento, that Mr. C. Cook's, of San Francisco, display of hair jewelry was remarkable for its delicacy of work and beauty of design, and was altogether the finest ever made in the State. We were glad that the practitioner for a beautiful and useful art had received encouragement. When we read:

"There are displays of hair flowers made by Mrs. Luther McColl, Miss Alice S. Watson, Mrs. A. Evers, Miss Mattie Gelmer, Miss Mattie Austin, (only 7 years old,) Mrs. Homer Holland, Mrs. H. K. Snow, and Edith M. Davis, which are especially excellent."

We did not admire the industry of these ladies, including the young lady of seven years old, who occupied their time in cutting up hair and gumming it into the shape of flowers.

Miss Davenport's Organ.

Miss Davenport, now Mrs General Lander, has a paper entirely devoted to her. She is playing in New York; on the first page of the Citizen we find an editorial praising her rendition of the roll of "Elizabeth," and comparing her to Ristori; on the fourth is another in which we are told she is "one of the purest women who ever paced before the footlights." On the fifth is another, informing the public that "she is a noble actress, and yet nobler woman;" still another on the eighth page is a statement that she "acted as chief Sister of Charity in our Southern hospitals during several years of the late war, in which her gallant husband lost his life from a rebel bullet;" and on the same page are two announcements of the appearance of this lady. We approve of advertising, but not of too much editorial puffery—even of a Sister of Charity—and we think the Citizen has laid it on just a little too thick.

The Animal Drama.

Next week Azael, The Prodigal, is to be produced at the Metropolitan Theatre. Any number of animals, horses, camels, goats, etc., are to be introduced in a grand procession. This is all very well as far as it goes, but we maintain that it is not enough. We know the story of the Prodigal and the dramatic version will not be worth anything unless those swine are introduced. As there is a large ballet force engaged for the piece, we have no anxiety about the fatted calves.

Who's Airald.

At the fire last night, at the foot of Clay street, it was amusing to see the sudden rush from the vicinity of the burning building which took place when a small keg of powder exploded. But no one was afraid. Not a bit of it. They were all "carried away by the crowd." One philosophical individual declared "it took a good deal to scare him, for he calculated the chances, and when he found them to stand twenty-five to one against his being injured, he'd take those chances." Another said, "I guess if the firemen ain't scared we needn't be;" he was a considerable distance from the building; he was a short man who could have ducked down and sheltered himself among the taller members of the crowd. He wasn't afraid. No one was afraid. We weren't scared by the explosion; we didn't run, but when that keg blew up we were carried away by the crowd.

Clergymen and Literature.

Clergymen are fond of dabbling in literature now-a-days. Henry Ward Beecher is writing a novel for the Ledger, and Horatio Stebbins is advertised as a contributor to the Golden Era!

MIDSUMMER.

AROUND this lovely valley rise
The purple hills of Paradise.

Oh, softly on yon banks of haze
Her rosy face the Summer lays!

Becalmed along the azure sky,
The argosies of cloudland lie,
Whose shores, with many a shining rift,
Far off their pearl white peaks uplift.

Through all the long midsummer-day
The meadow sides are sweet with hay,
I seek the coolest sheltered seat
Just where the field and forests meet—
Where grow the pine trees tall and bland
The ancient oaks austere and grand,
And fringy roots and pebbles fret
The ripples of the rivulet.

I watch the mowers as they go
Through the tall grass, a white sleeved row;
With even stroke their scythes they swing,
In tune their merry whetstones ring;
Behind, the nimble youngsters run
And toss the green swaths in the sun;
The cattle graze; while, warm and still,
Slopes the broad pasture, basks the hill,
And bright, when summer breezes break,
The green wheat crinkles like a lake.

The butterfly and the humble-bee
Come to the pleasant woods with me;
Quickly before me runs the quail,
The chickens skulk behind the rail.
High up the lone wood-pigeon sits,
And the woodpecker pecks and flits.
Sweet woodland music sinks and swells,
The brooklet rings its tinkling bells,
The swarming insects drone and hum,
The partridge beats his throbbing drum,
The squirrel leaps among the boughs,
And chatters in his leafy house.
The oriole flashes by; and, look!
Into the mirror of the brook,
Where the vain bluebird trims his coat,
Two tiny feathers fall and float.

As silently, as tenderly,
The down of peace descends on me;
Oh, this is peace! I have no need
Of friend to talk, of book to read;
A dear Companion here abides;
Close to my thrilling heart He hides;
The holy silence is His voice:
I lie and listen, and rejoice.

J. T. TROWBRIDGE.

PROLL. A MYSTERY.

IN the last will and testament of Mr. John Smith, of Allsop-terrace, Halifax, (the instrument may be consulted by the incredulous at the usual expence of a shilling and patience), will be found a paragraph to the following effect:

"Also, I give and bequeath to 'Proll,' whatever or whomsoever that may prove to be, his or her heirs or legal representatives, the sum of three thousand pounds Three per Cent Consolidated Bank Annuities, desiring that my executors, hereinafter named, shall make every reasonable effort for the discovery of the aforesaid 'Proll,' his or her, etc.; which efforts shall comprise an advertisement, thrice repeated, in a leading London journal, as well as the local papers of Liverpool and Birmingham. And, in default of such efforts proving successful within a year and a day, have my said executors shall expend the fund aforesaid in the purchase of some sufficing tokens for the reward of any remarkable deeds of personal powess, which shall be and occur within three years of my decease."

The singular wording of this bequest created much local interest at the time, and attracted an unusual amount of attention to the character and history of a harmless little man who might have otherwise slipped out of this bustling world as noiselessly as he had dwelt in it.
